Borromean that I ended up with. How did I end up with it? It is certain that currently, in short, if I, of course, know what is coming subsequently, the only thing that will allow the thread to be found, namely,, what gives it its consistency, the only thing that will allow the thread of the sequence, the sequence of seminars of which you have the first and the last, thanks to the care of someone, and also the one that is not the median, the one that is the eleventh. This is assuredly what will give to it what I designate as consistency.

How does it happen that something which, I recalled it, might have been the start of a different mode of thinking, with rigour, more geometrico, is what, is what Spinoza, for example, prided himself on spinning out, on deducing something according to the mode and the model given by the Ancients. It is clear that this more geometrico defines a mode of intuition which is properly mathematical and that this mode of intuition, after all, is not self-evident.

The way in which the point, the line, is in a way fomented from a fiction, and for that matter the surface which is only sustained by the split, by the break, by a break that is no doubt specified, specified as being in two dimensions – but since the line is only a dimension by being without consistency properly speaking, it is not saying a lot to say that one is going to add on one – and on the other hand the third, the one that in sum is erected by a line perpendicular to the surface, is something very strange. How, without something giving a support to what must be said to be an abstraction founded on the cut of a saw, how, without rediscovering the cord, make such a construction hold up? But on the other hand, it is not by chance either that things happen like that. No doubt there is here a necessity which is, let us say, my God, because I do not find any better, which is the weakness of a manual being, homo faber as he was described. But why should this manual being, the homo faber who for that matter, if only, as I remarked, for carrying around what he attacks, what he manipulates, starts from something that has consistency, starts from the cord?

http://www.lacaninireland.com

What necessity requires that this cord, this cord – which in the tenth rule, that of Descartes, that I recalled – Descartes evokes that moreover, after all, the art of the weaver, the art of the plait, the art of the sewer could give the model, how does it happen that these things (89) become so exhausted, become exhausted to this point that their thread becomes inconsistent?

Perhaps there is here this something which is related to a repression? Before going as far as to say that this repression, is the primordial one, is the Urverdrängt, is what Freud designated as inaccessible in the unconscious… [Uproar at the back of the hall]. It would perhaps be no bad thing if someone at the back should take the floor and ask me a question, that would show me how loudly I must raise my voice for people to hear me, since these things seem to work badly. Could someone at the back open up this path that I wished for earlier?

We must start from the fact, is that not so, of how easy it is to make a mistake in the depiction of this knot, of this special knot that I designate as being Borromean and which has this singular property that it is enough to break something which nevertheless is simply depicted in it, namely, a torus, namely, a torus which precisely it is enough to cut to have in one's hand this thickness, this consistency, namely, what makes a cord.

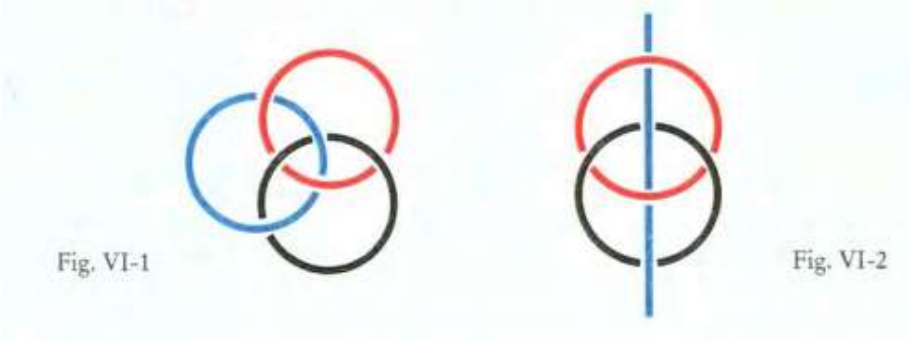

Fig. VI-1 Fig. VI-2

This indeed is why, questioning, questioning my knot that can be drawn in this way [on the board, VI-1] and in fact is drawn, I noted the fact that it was no less drawable and that it remained a knot on this single condition that one of its buckles is opened out [VI-2] and that it is transformed into a straight line. We rediscover here the question that I asked at the start, that of the straight line and the slightness of its mathematical, geometrical consistency. Here this restored consistency supposes that we extend it to infinity for it to continue to fulfil its function. We must then see this cord infinitely prolonged, on the top and on the bottom, for the knot to remain such, to remain a knot. This (90) indeed is how the straight line, the straight line on which in short this cord takes its support in its present state, the straight line is scarcely consistent and it is indeed on this moreover that geometry has, as one might say, slipped. In other words starting from the moment when, in a geometry described as spherical, one has restored infinity to this straight line, by making of it a new ring. Without noticing that from the position of the knot, of the Borromean knot, this ring is implicated and that there was no need then perhaps to have made this whole circuit.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

In any case, the last time you saw me extending this geometry of the Borromean knot of three, to the depiction of what is required for it to be valid for four. This was to give you the experience of the difficulty of what I called the mental knot. But I know well that it is with the attempt to flatten it, to flatten out this mental knot, namely, to submit oneself to the fact that this supposed thought, namely, something that sticks to extension, has a condition. Far from being separated from it, as Descartes supposes, thought is only extended, and again, it needs an extension, not just any one whatsoever, an extension in two dimensions, an extension that can be drawn. For this indeed is the way that it will not be displaced, in which it will not be inopportune to define this surface whose geometry I showed earlier, the one that is imagined, that is essentially sustained by an Imaginary. It is indeed like that that one could moreover define this surface, this cut of a saw on a solid, the fact is that it presents something, something to draw.

It is singular that the only way people have managed in short to reproduce this ideal surface, is precisely something that people back away from, namely, the plait of a canvas. And that it should be on a canvas that the painter has in short to draw, because it is all that he finds himself able to do to tame the look, as I expressed it at one time, what is involved in this function of the painter. And that here also it is on something specified, the blackboard, that I find myself inevitably flattening out, flattening out what I have to communicate to you about the knot. It is indeed here that in effect there is sensed in a particular way, there is sensed the fact that, the knot that I have on the other hand depicted thanks to your perspective imagination, namely, how the Borromean knot of three holds up, how it is made. It is made of two knots which are independent of one another, and it is a matter of knowing where the third passes for this to make a knot.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

I asked you the same question concerning what was required for it to (91) be a knot, even if at the start we leave the three rings of string of the first problem, we leave them independent, and I depicted for you by also flattening it out, even though in a way which bore its perspective, by depicting for you what is involved in what happens for these three rings that I drew independent, contenting myself, to simplify things for you, to show how they must be traced out in order that the fourth, the fourth that I represented a bit differently from the way in which I am now doing, highlighting for you the quadruple function of the fourth ring of string [VI-3].

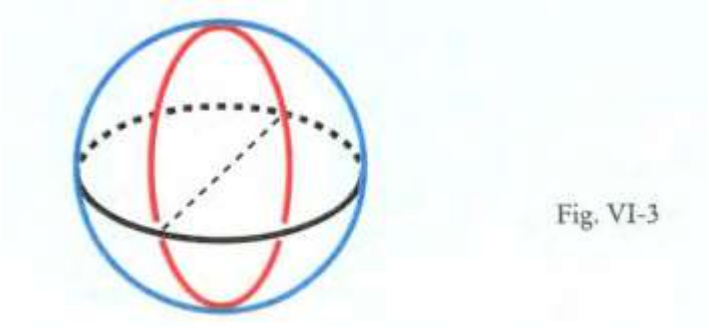

Fig. VI-3

But when I wanted to flatten it out in a way that reproduces in modifying it, namely, in making the three knots, the three rings of string independent from the start, I found that I had made an error. And I can say that this error was a matter rather of a mistake linked to the fact that being weary of it, weary of remembering these things that I had seen myself as correctly depicting what results from the flattening out, from a flattening out modelled on that of the knot of three, I omitted, I missed as I might say, I explicitly missed, through weariness, and moreover to give you, good God, an example of how little naturalness there is in the way these things work, namely, the representation of the knot. [On the board]. Here then, to take up the mental thing, the way in which first of all this operates. If from the upper to the lower, you note by 1, 2, 3 [VI-4] that which, of course, has nothing to do with an upper and a lower, since moreover it would be enough to turn them upside down for the problem to be renewed, here is how one should proceed. That I knew, but precisely it was by neglecting the fact that I found myself operating in the way that you have seen, and which left circle 1 outside the knot, but at the same time moreover all the others. It would be well to start from the fact (92) that the three circles flattened out in this way, and the 3 outside the 1, and to finish by the 3 in the 2. When one operates in this way, things work.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

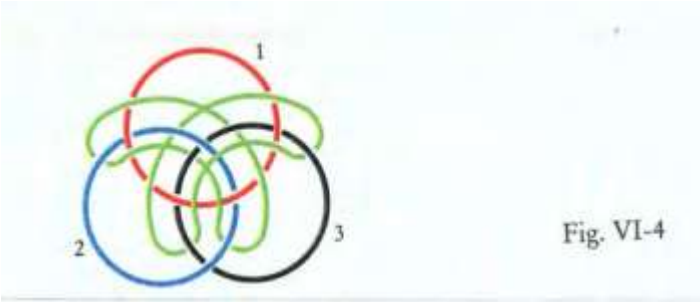

Fig. VI-4

It is no less true that it is easy to see that they can also function in a different way, but that there is a third one, precisely the one that I took the last time and which leaves one of these knots free and specifically the 1, by which at the same time, it leaves the others free.

Why in short did the blundered action work here, if not in order to testify that no analysis, after all, can avoid something, something not resisting in this theory of the knot. And it is indeed what after all, I do not think it is a bad thing to have made you sense, and to have made you aware of in an extremely experimental way. It is quite clear that the other way, that the other way, the other way that is distinguished by this, which is that by inverting these two propositions, namely, starting from what of the 2 is outside the 1, but what I am doing there has not…[on the board] what I am doing there and what I did not do at first confuses, since moreover it is by depicting things for you in a way which makes the two green rings of string seem to re-cross one another. Simply cancel out these four points and you will see that in every case the two ways of proceeding are quite appropriate.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

How are they so appropriate? They are so appropriate in that the function of the 2 and then of the 3, like the other figure, the one that is in perspective shows, as the other figure makes it appear, the function of the 2 and of the 3 are strictly equivalent and that with regard to the circle that might here be designated as 1, these two others are strictly equivalent, namely, as regards the way in which the pink ring goes around them, the mode is the same if we adopt this depiction.

What is there to say? What is there to say except that what this central figure highlights, is that the infinite straight line that figures there, the straight line described as infinite, but about which I remarked on one (93) occasion what it presupposes, namely, properly speaking the impossible, that this infinite straight line is opposed, is opposed by virtue of its rupture, and how can this rupture not be considered as a refinement (affine) of something which is quite essential to the knot, this straight line is opposed to what constitutes a ring as to what I called consistency, on the other hand to something on which I did not insist the last time and which is indeed what is essential to what we call a ring, and specifically a ring of string, namely, the hole that it has in the middle. Hence the question that I put the last time as to whether there was not a correspondence, a correspondence between consistency, ek-sistence and the hole and each one of the terms that I am putting forward as Imaginary, Symbolic and Real. If consistency is indeed as I stated the last time of the order of the Imaginary, since moreover the cord goes towards this vanishing point of the mathematical line, we have to question ourselves about what is involved in making the ring of string as such, and that if we say it is the hole, it is a fact that we are not satisfied with it: what is a hole, if nothing circumscribes it?

http://www.lacaninireland.com

Now, the last time, I had clearly marked that ek-sistence [on the board] namely, this something which, with regard to the opening and of what makes a hole, that the ek-sistence, namely, to flatten out things, this something that we ought, in the flattening out, to depict [VI-5] that ek-sistence belongs to this field, which is, as I might say, supposed by the rupture itself and that it is through it, through this in, in the a – write that l apostrophe a – that there is played out as one might say the fate of the knot, that if the knot has an ek-sistence, it is by belonging to this field and this indeed is why I stated that ek-sistence is with regard to this correspondence of the order of the Real, that the ek-sistence of the knot is Real to such a degree that I was able to say, I was able to put forward that the mental knot ek-sists, that the mens depicts it or not to itself, since what we see is that this ek-sistence of the knot is still to be explored, to be explored not without trouble, since there is not, to the best of my knowledge, anything at all, except to learn to constitute it and to learn it by the plait, which assuredly is not properly speaking a mental way of resolving the question, while it seems, it seems that there is properly speaking a resistance of the mens to 'mentaling' this knot. I gave you an example of it earlier.

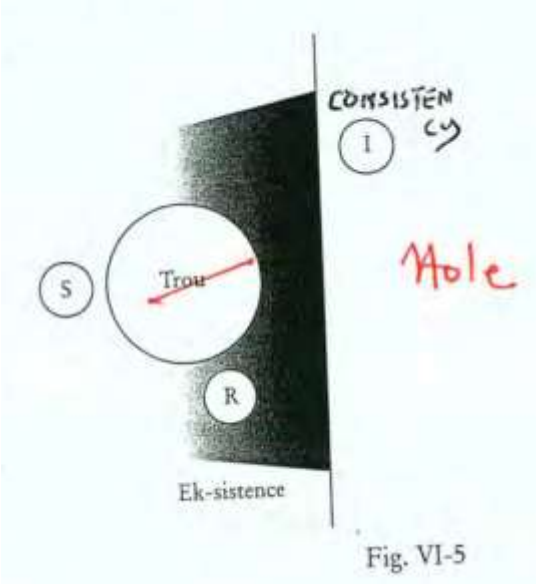

Fig. VI-5

http://www.lacaninireland.com

No doubt it is by a procedure called that of the remainder and which supposes as fundamental the order explored, explored starting from my experience, explored from the properly analytic experience which I said had led me to this infernal trinity, let us call it by its name, this infernal trinity of the Symbolic, the Imaginary and the Real. I do not think that I am playing a tune (cord) here which is not Freudian. Flectere si nequeo Superos our dear Freud wrote at the head of the Traumdeutung, Acheronta movebo. And it is no doubt here that there is illustrated, in short, what I called the truth, the truth of a certain religion, for which I highlighted that it is not at all by chance that it arrived at a divine notion which is of a trinity this one, contrary to the tradition to which it is itself connected. I am not telling you how I let myself go in confiding to an audience that was none other, if I remember correctly, than the one I believe in England, unless it was the one in Strasbourg. What matter, I did not go so far as to tell this secret that the desire of man, which is nevertheless tangible, is hell, hell very precisely in that it is hell that he is missing! And with this consequence that it is what he aspires to, and we have the testimony of it, the testimony in neurosis which is very exactly the fact is that neurosis is something that only happens in so far as it is for him a mirage in which he might be satisfied, namely, a perversion, that a neurosis is a failed perversion.

A simple illustration of the knot, of the knot and why it is to the knot that I come to try to sustain, as I might say, what is produced and which your number here bears witness to, namely, some interest. It is indeed because you are much more interested in short than you suppose each one of you, in this nodalising of the Imaginary, the Symbolic and the Real, that you are there, it seems to me. For moreover why would you take this strange satisfaction in listening to my stammering on this occasion, for moreover this is what I have to accept today, namely, that I can only clear the way to what this involves in terms of consequences.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

If it is indeed in effect in this mode that the ek-sistence of the knot is supported, namely, from this field that, flattened out, is intermediary to what gives rise to a question in this knot, intermediary to what makes a body out of the hole, while what the body supports, is something quite different, it is the line of consistency. A body, a body such as the one that you are supported by, is very precisely this something which for you has only the aspect of being what resists, what consists before being dissolved. And if the Real is to be localised somewhere, namely, in this field intermediary to the flattening out that I depicted, denoted as ek-sistence, it remains that it can only be by elimination that we may do it, and this is what gives rise to a question for us, that it is only, it is only by asking the question of whether the hole is indeed what is of the order of the Symbolic that I founded on the signifier, this indeed is the point that we will find ourselves having to settle in the course of this year.

[On the board] We find ourselves then at present, under an interrogative form, to put here the hole with a question mark and nothing else……
[break in the recording]
…in question what is involved in the Symbolic while here it is the Real, it is ek-sistence, and that consistency here corresponds to the Imaginary.

It is certain that these categories are not easily handled. They have in their favour nevertheless the fact of having left some traces in history, namely, that if it is at the end of the account, of the account of a traditional philosophical extenuation whose summit is given by Hegel that something sprung forth again under the name of someone called Kierkegaard, and you know the degree that I exposed him as converging with the experience that appeared much later in Freud, his promotion as such of ek-sistence. There is there something, it seems,

http://www.lacaninireland.com

of which one cannot say and of which one cannot find in Kierkegaard himself the testimony for, that it is not simply by the promotion of repetition as something more fundamental in experience than the resolution described as thesis, antithesis, synthesis on which Hegel wove History. The highlighting of this repetition as being a (96) fundamental function whose stamp is found in enjoyment and whose relations, the relations lived by the Kierkegaard in question, are those of a knot never avowed no doubt, but which is that of his father to sin. Namely, the introduction not of his own experience, but of the experience of the one who is found, with respect to him, to occupy the place of the father, that this place of the father at the same time becomes problematic. Namely that, a singular thing for a tradition that manipulated the Abba without rhyme or reason, that it should be at this date, and only at this date that there was promoted at the same time existence as such, which no doubt does not have the same accent as the one that I put in it by fragmenting it with a hyphen that it should be at this epoch that ek-sistence emerges, as I might say, emerges for me, emerges so that I can make something of it that is written differently, and that this is what is touchable, tangible in something that is defined by the knot. I do not believe that this is something of a nature to put me, as I might say, in continuity with a philosophical questioning, but much more rather into a mode of rupture which is moreover what is imposed if the emergence of the unconscious as a knowledge, as a knowledge proper to each one, to each particular person, is of a nature to completely change the conditions in which the very notion of knowledge has dominated, let us say, from ancient times, let us say even Antiquity. There has entered this character of knowledge along paths that we must question, that we must question in a way which, in any case puts its substance in question. If knowledge is something so dependent, so dependent on the relationships of generations to the Symbolic, to the hole of which I spoke of earlier, to call it by its name, if it is so dependent on the fact that the succession of generations fomented as knowledge, how can we not re-question its status. Is there, one, some knowledge in the

http://www.lacaninireland.com

Real? It is quite clear that the supposition from all time, but a supposition that was not properly speaking made, not avowed, is that to all appearances there was, since the Real worked, it operated properly. And this indeed is what manifests that for all of us, there is a change, because this in the Real we touch a knowledge in it in a quite different form.

It is specifically to take up again here my construction [goes to the board], it is specifically this that if we insist that a knowledge, should have as a support, not, I am not saying a hole, the consistency of the (97) Symbolic, what appears in the Real… What appears in the Real, is properly speaking this, because perhaps you remember that the Real, the Symbolic and the Imaginary are situated in this way. It is the something which, flattened out, flattened out because we think, that flattened out appears in the Real, namely, within the domain that the consistency of the ring of string alone allows to be defined, that is presented not like the knowledge immanent to the Real that there is no way of resolving except of putting it into it in the form of, of nous, in the form of something that the Real would know what it has to do, and when it is not this nous well then, it is the whole power and wisdom of God! I do not have to come back on the fact that you know, that you know because I dinned it into you, namely, that the world is not thinkable without God. I am talking about the Newtonian world, because how would each one of the masses know the distance it is at from all the others? There is no way out! Voltaire believed in the Supreme Being. I was not let into his confidence, I do not know what idea he had of it, but it could scarcely be far from the idea of all-knowing, namely, that he was the one who made the machine work. The old business of knowledge in the Real, we know that it has, good God, sustained in short all these old metaphors. These old metaphors when all is said and done, it must be said! Aristotle was a populist in short, was he not! It is the artisan who gives him the model for all his causes, his final cause if I may express myself thus, his formal cause, it (sa) causes, it even causes at full tilt, it causes even material and that is only the most hopeless of them [causer: cause, chat] It is certain that at the level of the cause, of the physical cause, of that which is inscribed by him in his Physics, all the haughtiness, is that not so of the nous, of the nous present to the world is reduced, is reduced to what I described in short as the artisinal, the artisinal which means that this was received with open arms everywhere the metaphor of the potter dominates and where it is a divine hand that makes the pot. How does it continue to turn nevertheless all by itself? This indeed is the question and the question on which the refinements of knowledge, if it continue to occupy itself with it, namely, to make it turn, or whether it leaves it turn all by itself after having ejected it, is truly secondary.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

But the whole question of knowledge is to be taken up again simply starting from the fact that a knowledge is only supposed from a relation to the Symbolic, namely, to this something that is incarnated by a material as signifying, which is not all by itself to ask an easy question. Because what is a signifying material? We have only the (98) tip of its muzzle in Aristotle, at the place where he talks about stoicheion but it is certain that the very idea of material is only strictly thinkable as coming from signifying material in which it finds its first examples.

So then! To try simply to note something, which will be what my notation will unfold around, it is certain that it is from an experience, from an experience of the depiction of the symptom as reflecting in the Real the fact that there is something that is not working and where, not in the Real of course, in the field of the Real, this something that does not work holds up. Holds up how? Holds up only by what I support in my language as a parlètre, from what is only a speaking being, because if he did not speak, he would not have the word being, and that to this speaking being, there is a field, a field connected to the hole that I depicted here – I apologise, I do not insist especially that my figures should be elegant, or symmetrical – it is in the measure that there is no possible opening, rupture, consistency coming from this hole, the locus of ek-sistence, Real, that the unconscious is here [VI-6] and that what here is tenuous (y fait tenue) passing behind the hole of the Real, behind on this figure, because if you turn it over, it is in front, that there is coherence, that there is consistency between the symptom and the unconscious. Except for the fact that the symptom cannot be defined otherwise than by the way in which each one enjoys the unconscious in so far as the unconscious determines it.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

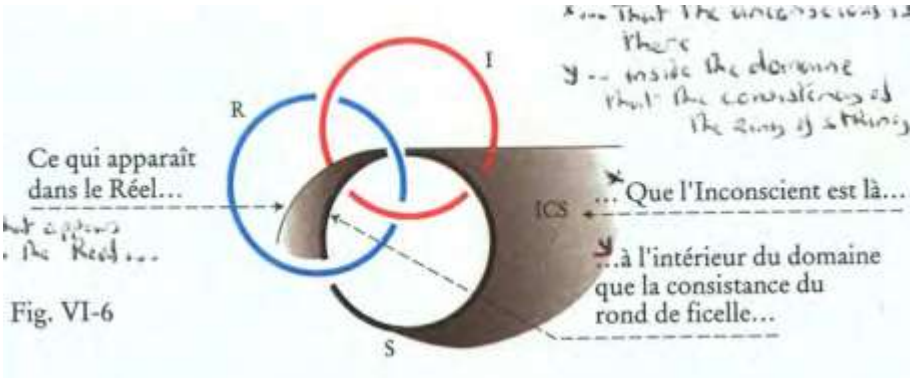

Fig. VI-6

To look for the origin of the notion of symptom, which is not at all to be looked for in Hippocrates, which is to be looked for in Marx, who was the first in the link that he made between capitalism, and what? The good old times, what people call them when they want, in short, (99) to try to call them something else, feudal times. Read all the literature on this. Capitalism is considered as having certain effects, and why in effect would it not have some! These effects are on the whole beneficial, since it has the advantage of reducing to nothing the proletarian man, thanks to which the proletarian man realises the essence of man, and by being stripped of everything is charged with being the Messiah of the future. Such is the way in which Marx analyses the notion of symptom. He gives of course crowds of other symptoms, but the relation of this with a faith in man is quite indisputable.

If we make of man, no longer anything whatsoever who conveys a future ideal, but if we determine him from the particularity, in every case, of his unconscious and the way in which he enjoys it, the symptom remains at the same place that Marx put it, but it takes on a different meaning. It is not a social symptom, it is a particular symptom. No doubt, these particular symptoms have types, and the symptom of the obsessional is not the symptom of the hysteric. This is very precisely what I will try to get across to you in what follows.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

For the obsessional nevertheless, I note it right away, there is a very particular symptom. No one, of course, has the slightest apprehension of death, otherwise you would not be so calm there. For the obsessional, death is a parapraxis (un acte manqué). It is not so stupid, because death is only approachable by an act. Again, for it to be successful, someone would have to commit suicide knowing that it is an act, which happens very rarely. Even though it was very widespread at a certain epoch, at the epoch when philosophy had a certain import, an import other than that of sustaining the social edifice, there are some people who managed to group themselves in a school in a way that had consequences. But it is quite singular and indeed of a nature also to make us suspect the authenticity of commitment in these so-called schools, that there was no need to have reached any wisdom whatsoever, that it was enough to be a good obsessional to know from a sure source that death is a parapraxis. Not of course that this presumes that I will not give some development to it, but I will stay with that today, since moreover I have not been able, as one might have expected, to tackle the difficulty (l'os) of what I wanted to tell you, namely, whether by saying that the woman does not ek-sist, as someone has objected to me, I did not make her ek-sist! Don't believe a word of it. This will be the thing that I will tackle the next time. I think I can sustain that it is in the state of one or of innumerable ones…but ones that are numerable, I will not say innumerable, but from perfectly numerable one, that women ek-sist, and not in the state of The.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

Seminar 7: Tuesday 11 March 1975

I have two reasons for being encouraged, in short, to take things from an angle different to the one which you saw me at the last time.

The fact is, since I had the frailty to authorise the publication of these seminars in a certain bulletin I was, at the same time, constrained to look at the first two which were due to come out in the second number of this bulletin. And all things considered, I said to myself…in short, despite the difficulty, not, of course, in orientating myself but in sustaining your interest, in sustaining your interest because I am talking this year about the R.S.I., well then, good God, even these first explorations, these two first seminars did not seem to be so intolerable.

The second reason for encouragement was brought to me by the response, in short the response, I am not sure that it is simply a response… I mean that the people who sent me two papers on knots, and very especially on Borromean knots, namely, Michel Thomé and Pierre Soury, their paper had something that was altogether worthy of interest. It is to these papers that the little drawings on the lower row respond to. For the first, those of the first row, they continue, follow on from what I had to tell you, from what I proposed to myself to tell you this year.

So then, R.S.I., I write this year as a title. They are only letters, and as such presuppose an equivalence. What results from the fact that I speak these letters, by using them as initials, and that I speak them as Real, Symbolic and Imaginary? That takes on a meaning, and this (102) question of meaning is indeed what, nothing less, I am trying to situate this year. It takes on a meaning, but what is proper to meaning, is that one names something in it. And this gives rise to the dit-mansion, the dit-mansion precisely of this vague thing that are called things, and that only take on their foundation from the Real, namely, from one of the three terms from which I made something that could be called the emergence of meaning.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

Names them, I said. What I did in, I am not saying yet in demonstrating (démontrant), because this amounts to something that is no more demonstrable than the Borromean knot, this amounts to a showing (monstration). If I have been led to the showing of this knot, while what I was looking for was a demonstration of a doing, the doing of analytic discourse, that is already enough, I would say, whether it is a showing or a demonstrating. In any case what I would like to advance today, is something about which I – it is not without guile, because I always slip in things like that, quite gently, there is something of a ruse in it and it is not nothing either to recognise it – the fact is that I indicated to you one day that Freud's work revolves around the Name-of-the-Father. It makes no use at all of the Symbolic, the Imaginary nor of the Real, but it nevertheless implies them. And what I want to tell you, is that it is not for nothing that I did not speak about the Name-of-the-Father, when I began, as I imagine some know because I go over it enough, I spoke about the Names-of- the-Father. Well then, the Names-of-the-father is this:

Fig. VII-1

[On the board] the Symbolic, the Imaginary and the Real according to my meaning, with the weight that I gave earlier to the word meaning.

That is what the Names-of-the-father are, the first names, in so far as they name something as is indicated – yes, as the Bible indicates in (103) connection with this extraordinary yoke that is called the Father there, the first phase of this human imagination that is God is consecrated on giving a name, good God, to something that is not indifferent, namely, a name to each of the animals. Of course, before the Bible, namely writing, there was a tradition. This did not come from nothing. It is tangible, tangible to the point that it ought to strike the lovers of tradition, the fact is that a tradition is always, what I would call fucked-up. That is even why people have a devotion to it, there is no other way of being attached to it than devotion, it is always so appallingly…what I have just said. All that one can hope from a tradition is that it should be less fucked up than another one. How can that be judged? There we enter into the more and the less. That is judged by the surplus-enjoying (plus-de-jouir) as production.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

The surplus-enjoying, is obviously all we have to get our teeth into. It is because it is a matter of enjoying that one believes in it. Enjoying, as one might say, is at the horizon of this more and of this less, it is an ideal point. An ideal point that one calls as one can, the phallus, and I already underlined at one time that in the speaking being, this always has the closest relationship, it is the essence of the comic. Once you talk about something that has a relationship to the phallus, it is the comic. The comic has nothing to do with the witticism as I underlined at one time when I spoke about the witticism. The phallus is something else, it is comical like everything comical. It is a sad comic. When you read Lysistrata, you can take it from two sides, laugh or find it bitter. It must be said that the phallus is what gives body to the Imaginary. I recall here something that greatly struck me at one time. I saw a little film that Jenny Aubry brought to propose to me, by way of illustration, what I called at that time the mirror stage. There was a child before the mirror, and I no longer know whether it was a little girl or a little boy – it is even quite striking that I no longer remember…someone here perhaps remembers – but what is certain, is that the little girl or the little boy, grasps there, in a gesture, something that to my eyes had this value: that in supposing as I do on foundations that are not too sure, that this mirror stage consists in the unity that is grasped, in the collecting together, in the assumed mastery by reason of this image of the fact that this premature body, uncoordinated up to then, seems to be collected together. By making (104) a body of it, a knowledge that he masters it – this does not happen, without one being able to affirm it, of course, to the same degree in animals that are born mature, there is not this joy of the mirror stage – what I called jubilation. Well then, there is truly a link, a link between that and something which was made tangible in this film, by something which, whether it was a little boy or a little girl, I underline for you had the same value, the elision, in the form of a gesture, the hand that goes in front, the elision of what was perhaps a phallus, or perhaps its absence. A gesture, clearly, removed it from the image. And this was tangible to me as a correlate, as I might say of this prematurity. There is here something whose link is in a way primordial with respect to something that will later be called shame, but which it would be exaggerated to take into account at the stage described as that of the mirror.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

The phallus then is the Real. Especially in so far as it is elided. If you come back to what I opened up this year by trying to harmonise for you consistence, ek-sistence and hole, with, on the other hand, Imaginary, Real, for ek-sistence, and Symbolic, I would say then that the phallus, is not the ek-sistence of the Real. There is a Real that ek-sists with respect to this phallus, which is called enjoyment, but it is rather its consistency. It is the concept, as I might say, of the phallus. With the concept, I am echoing the word Begriff, which does not work out so badly since in sum it is, it is this phallus that is taken in the hand! There is something in the concept that is not unrelated with this announcement, this announcement this prefiguring of an organ that is not yet taken as consistency, but as an appendix and which is fairly well manifest in what prepares man, as we are told…in short, or what resembles him, what is not far, namely, the monkey (singe). The monkey masturbates, it well known! And that is how he resembles man, it is quite certain! In the concept, there is always something of the order of the grimace (singerie). The only difference between the monkey and the man, is that the phallus does not consist any less in him in his female aspects than in what are described as male in what he has, a phallus, as I illustrated it by this brief vision earlier, being equivalent to its absence.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

Hence the special accent that the speaking being puts on the phallus, in this sense that enjoyment ek-sists in it, that this is the emphasis proper to the Real. The Real, in so far as it ek-sists, namely, the Real (105) as Real, the Real to the power of two. It is all that this speaking being knows about the two, it is the power, or a semblance through which he remains the one, alone. This is what is called being. This from the start, one to the power of two equals one, $1^2 = 1$.

There must be a link, since I told you like that, indicated it at one time, there must be a link between that and meaning, in other words that by which one is so well applied to zero. It is Frege who discovered it and I chattered at one time about the difference between Sinn and Bedeutung, namely, something which…where there can be seen the difference between zero and one, while suggesting that it is not a difference. There is nothing as good as an empty set to suggest the one.

There you are. So then, how the Symbolic – the Symbolic like that, about which I simply remarked that it has its weight in analytic practice, how the Symbolic, namely, what is ordinarily called blah-blah, or again the Verb, all that is the same, how does it cause meaning? Here is the question that I am only asking you because I have the answer. Is it in the idea of the unconscious? Is that what I have been saying since the first Rome discourse? – Question marks, huh! – It is not in the idea of the unconscious, it is in the idea that the unconscious ek-sists, written as I write it, namely, that it conditions the Real, the Real of this being that I designate as a speaking being. He names things, as I recalled earlier, here, in connection with this first fooling around of the Bible in the Terrestrial Paradise. He names things for this speaking being, namely, that this being who himself is a kind of animal, but who singularly differs from one. He is only animal in this, because animal means nothing, huh, it means nothing except to characterise the animal by his way of reproducing, sexed or not sexed, an animal is that, it is what reproduces itself.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

Only, how is this animal is parasited by the Symbolic, by the blah-blah? Yes, there, it seems to me, it seems to me but it is not very probable, that I distinguish myself from people of the same animal species, who as far as human memory goes, make no mistake, know that they speak but do not pay explicit attention to it. And what shows that they do not pay explicit attention to it, is not, of course, that they have not said it, everything is said in the blah-blah, they do not pay explicit attention to it for this reason: they dream of not being the only ones (les seuls). That, that catches them in the gut! Write laisseuls, if you wish, to evoke the left alone (laissés seuls) in this talk.

(106) In our day, it is manifested like that, by this frantic need to discover language in dolphins, in bees. Anyway! Why not.! It is always a dream! Formerly, it had different forms, which shows clearly that it is always a dream. They dreamt that there is at least one God who speaks, and who does not speak especially without that having an effect. Who causes/talks! The unheard of thing is this tangling of paws which means that they absolutely must shore up this God with sub-speakers, angles they are called, I mean by the commentators!

In short there is all the same something more serious, is that not so, which has come from this fact that there is all the same a tiny little advance, not a progress, of course, because there is no reason for people not continuing to get their paws entangled. The fact is that in linguistics, namely, as regards talking there is all the same distinguished the giving a name, naming, and consecrating a thing, in the name of speech (parlotte). You see all the same here that it is distinct from communication. That it is there that speech, properly speaking, is knotted to something of the Real. Naming yes! Naming. [English] What is the relationship of this naming, as the title of a book puts it, with necessity?

http://www.lacaninireland.com

The unheard of thing is that for a long time, is that not so, there was someone named Plato who realised that the third was required in it, the third term, of the idea, of the eidos, which is all the same a very good Greek word to translate what I call the Imaginary, huh! Because that means image! He very clearly saw that without the eidos, there was no chance that names would stick to things. This did not get to the point of him stating the Borromean knot of three, of the Real, the Symbolic and the Imaginary. But it is because chance had not provided him with it. The idea gave, for him, the consistency of the Real. Nevertheless the idea being nothing in his time except the nameable, the result was what was deduced; of course! What was deduced like that, with the university discourse, the realism of the name. It must be said, the realism of the name if worth more than the nominalism of the Real, namely, that the name, well, good God, one can put any one at all on it to designate the Real. Philosophical nominalism, like that, it is not so that I am marking a preference, I note simply that nominalism is an enigma that is tangible in this sense, that it pays homage to the effect of the name on the Real, namely, to what is added to it by the fact of naming it. All nominalism, to distinguish itself from the realism of the name, has founded itself on (107) the Imaginary. The fact is that there is a saying less. One is forbidden to admit this homage, this is found in the prestige of the University, but this does not appear to us, to us analysts, to constitute an advantage. We remain in thought. You will tell me that I am having a good time with it and even to the point that it tires you, but I do not see why the fact that I have a good time with it, on occasion, should be expressed by anything other than an effort to extricate myself from it. To extricate myself from what is fundamental for thought, namely, what I would call the imbecility typical, typical of the mens, of the human mood, with respect to the Real that it nevertheless has to deal with. Hence the urgency that the meaning of this word Real should be discerned.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

Up to the present what I said there, in connection with tradition, preserves all its value. There is nothing more negotiable than religion, the 'green pasture' [English], to go here straight to the goal, the at-least-one God, huh, the true about the true, is Him – capital H! Who taught the speaking being to give a name to each thing? The non-dupe of the name of the name of the Name-of-the-Father, the non-dupers without that, for the siste or the zest eternity. Hence it results all the same, by standing back a little, that the Real, is what ek-sists with regard to meaning, in so far as I define it by the effect of lalangue on the idea, in other words on the imaginary supposed by Plato, in the speaking animal, among others animal-bodies or the devil-in-the-body, as you wish. Because why not like that, since we are dealing with mental deficiency, one mental defective is as good as another, why not Plato? Aristotle who, for his part, argues about the idea of the donkey, in order to say that the donkey is a donkey, and that it is indeed him, and that there is no capital donkey, huh, and well! He also anistotes!

The Real must be conceived as what is expelled from meaning. It is the impossible as such. It is the aversion from meaning…it is also, if you wish, the aversion of meaning into anti-meaning and ante-meaning. It is the return shock of the Verb, in so far as the Verb is only there for that. A that (un ça) which is not for nothing, if it takes into account what is at stake, namely, the filth from which the world cleanses itself, in principle, if in fact there is a world. That does not mean that it manages to do it! Man is still there. The ek-sistence of the filthy (immonde), namely, of what is not world (monde), this is the Real full stop! But it is worthwhile pushing this as far as the elaboration of the quantifier , there ek-sists an x such, which rather than an x, it would be better to say, yes one (une) x in order that she henceforth ek-sists, this one, the ek-sistence as one. This is what (108) we must ask ourselves, it is to what does she ek-sist? She ek-sists with respect to the ideic consistency of the body, that which, reproduces this body, just as Plato situates it very well, according to the formula, now that we are contaminating the idea with the supposed message of genes. It ek-sists with regard to the Symbolic in so far as the Symbolic turn in circles around an inviolable hole, otherwise the knot of three would not be Borromean. Because that is what it means, the Borromean knot, it is that the hole, the hole of the Symbolic is inviolable.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

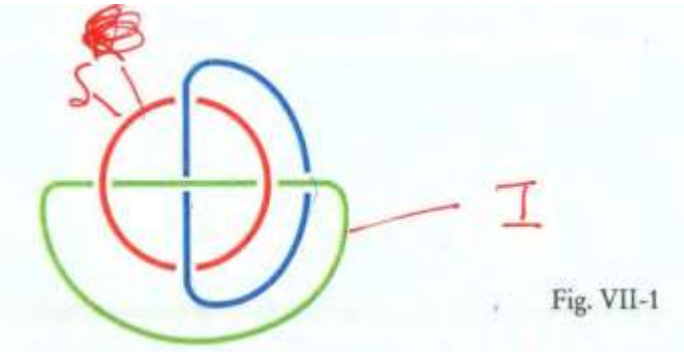

Fig. VII-1

There you are. So then why not write it like this, in the order where it is simplest to write it, the Symbolic, here [VII-1] this is what I make into a ring, there, this Symbolic imposing itself on the Imaginary that I put in green, the colour of hope, huh!

We see how the Real ek-sists there, by no longer being compromised by being knotted with the said Symbolic in particular, any more than the Imaginary does. So there, I showed you while I was at it that whatever may be the meaning, is that not so, into which one turns this Imaginary and this Real, they will cross one another, as it is here flattened out, in a way in any case that will not make a chain. For the indication here, in this form of crossing, is moreover that these two consistencies may be straight lines at infinity; but that what must be specified, is that however one conceives of this point at infinity, which was dreamt up by Desargues as being specific to the straight line, a straight line that returns from one of its ends to the other, this must be carefully pointed out, that there is in no way a question that it is

http://www.lacaninireland.com

imagined as folding back on itself, without that which, first passed over, still passing over the other.

So then what we come to is that to demonstrate that the Name-of-the-Father is nothing other than this knot, there is no other way of managing than to suppose them unknotted [on the board]. let us no longer pass the Symbolic in front of the Imaginary. Let us do it like that. Here is what you have then. And then, how knot them? By a ring which knots these three independent consistencies. There is a way which is the one that I call the Name-of-the-Father which is what Freud did. And at the same time I reduce the Name-of-the-Father to its radical function which is to give a name to things, with all the consequences that this involves, because it does not fail to have consequences! And, up to the day in particular, which I indicated to you earlier.

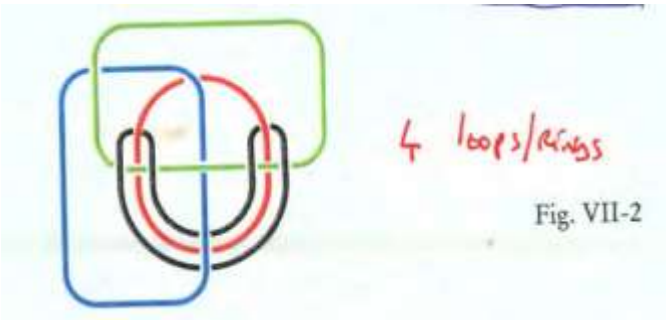

Fig. VII-2

I already made a drawing for you, a drawing of these four knotted, as such. I even made one that failed. But the big one, the right one, is that one here that I am reproducing for you today but in profile namely, that instead of seeing it vertically, I see it transversely. It is this one, the big circle about which I showed you that by distinguishing these three circles as they are in an armillary sphere, namely, containing one another, one must hook the innermost circle, pass over the outermost circle, by putting oneself before returning (110) onto the outermost circle within the middle circle. This is what was expressed by the first schema that I gave you.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

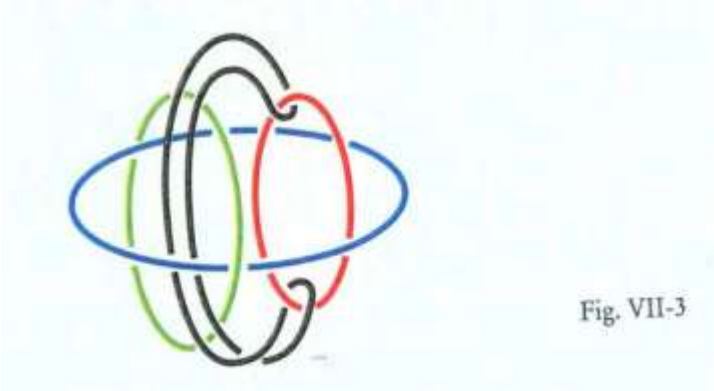

Fig. VII-3

Who can fail to see that this business leaves us in the three, namely, as one might expect, what is involved in the distinction in the Symbolic of name-giving forms part of this Symbolic, as is demonstrated by the fact that the addition of this four is in a way superfluous. Namely, that what you see here in a particularly clear way, I repeated it because here perhaps this does not stand out clearly, is that the Borromean knot is that.

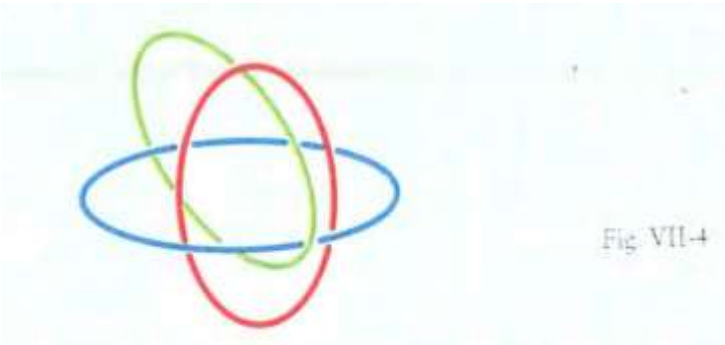

Fig. VII-4

It is that before being flattened out in any way whatsoever. The Borromean knot is what, for two circles that circumscribe one another, introduces this third to penetrate into one of these circles in such a way that the other, as I might say, should with respect to the third be brought into the same relationship as it is with the first circle.

Is there a discernible order here? Is the Borromean knot a whole, a conceivable whole, make no mistake, or indeed does it imply an order? At first approach, one could say that it implies an order in the case where each of these circles remains coloured, as was very correctly expressed precisely by someone who sent me a text where he uses the word coloured, which means on this occasion that each one remains identified to itself. One could say that if they are coloured,

http://www.lacaninireland.com

there is an order, that 1, 2, 3, is not 1, 3, 2. The question nevertheless is to be left in suspense. It is perhaps with regard to all the effects of the knot that this order is indifferent: 1, 2, 3, 1, 3, 2, which would put us on the path indeed that they are not to be identified. It was in so far as three making a knot, making a Borromean knot, namely, of which (111) no ring forms a chain at any moment with another of these rings, it is as such that we must support the idea of the Symbolic, of the Imaginary and of the Real. What suggests it to me is what I received from one of those who are interested in the knot, as I said earlier: someone named Michel Thomé sent me a little letter to show me that in a certain figure, a figure that I did not check out and that I never drew here in any case, that in a certain figure, someone who had introduced into the publication of my seminar XX, had made what he calls an error, and an error of perspective. He had highlighted the fact that from one circle to the other of the three the first by being knotted to it, the simplest form of the Borromean knot, was, since I have used this term, the circle folded in two ears. The person who had the goodness to edit me (m'éditer, m-apostrophe), the person who had the goodness to edit me, made this error of perspective while keeping the folded form in the same order, [on the board] here corresponding to this, and here corresponding to this, and so on, to consider that the two wings of these two ears simply made two and not to cross them. Hence there results immediately this succession of consequences that Michel Thomé has very clearly seen, namely, that these knots are intertwined and that, as a consequence, [on the board] by cutting the one that here is supposed to hold together the totality of these two buckles, these two ears that I spoke about earlier, would end up with what it is easy to see, this figure here first, indeed those at the extreme end, where one clearly sees that these knots are intertwined.

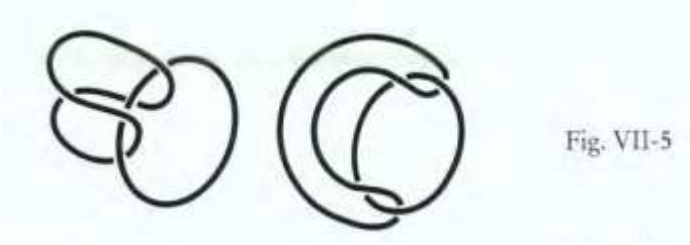

Fig. VII-5

http://www.lacaninireland.com

But that is not all. This is not all for, as Michel Thomé had very well deduced right away, is that there will result a Borromean knot of a special type, which will be such that to limit ourselves here, for example, to four, but you can see that it works just as well with three, since I have pointed it out to you, these two here remain knotted, either this one, or that one, remain knotted; if one sections the third, no need then to put four of them.

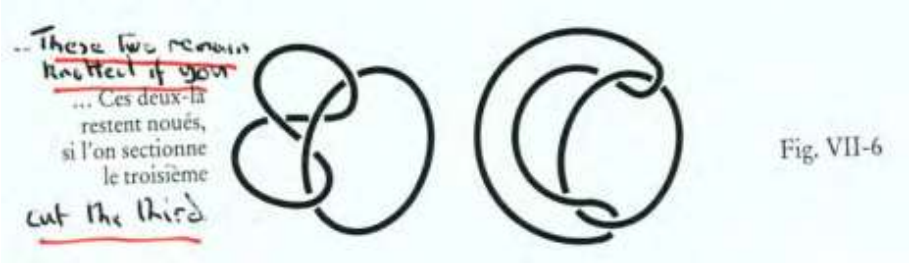

Fig. VII-6

(112) To see this, that only the four highlight, the fact is that there is no means of manifesting the Borromean quality of this knot of four for example, except by cutting a single one of them, namely, the one that we can call here the last, as a result of which each of the others will be freed from its follower up to the first. But as one might say, a distinction must be made here, they will not be freed together, they will be freed one after the other. While on the contrary, if you begin to cut the one that I have called the first, all the others up to the last will remain knotted. There is something here that is very interesting to demonstrate something particular about certain knots, that one can call Borromean in one sense but not in the other. Which evokes already the idea of the cycle and of orientation.

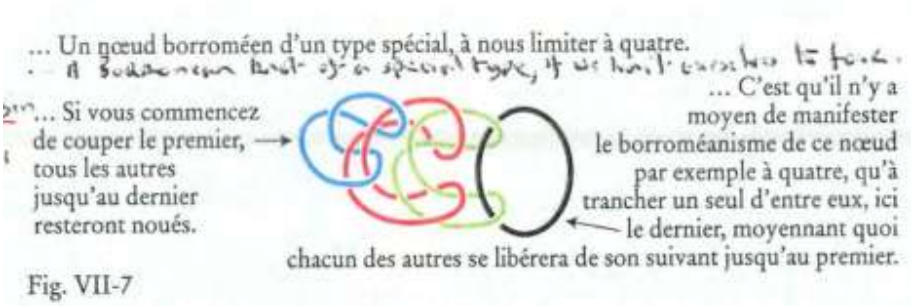

Fig. VII-7

I am not insisting because I think that it is really only those who devote themselves to a searching study of this knot, that are likely to take a veritable interest in it.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

[On the board] Here I had myself drawn a knot whose only interest is that it cannot be produced from this error of perspective to which Michel Thomé has given its fruitfulness. It is only strictly producible (113) by having been explicitly made, as I might say, by confusing the two buckles which hold on each side the forms of the ears which are the ones that I proposed as the simplest form to generate the Borromean knot. You see it here. Here there could be an external knot, an external ring that would hold these two buckles, these two buckles of ears, why not say it, and so on if you reunite these two knots, these two rings, I already alluded to it at one time, you obtain the following form which is a buckle that is quite distinct from the forms that I will call on this occasion, as I might say thoméenes, namely, those that are produced from an error of perspective such as this one, indeed an error of perspective such as this one which is not the same.

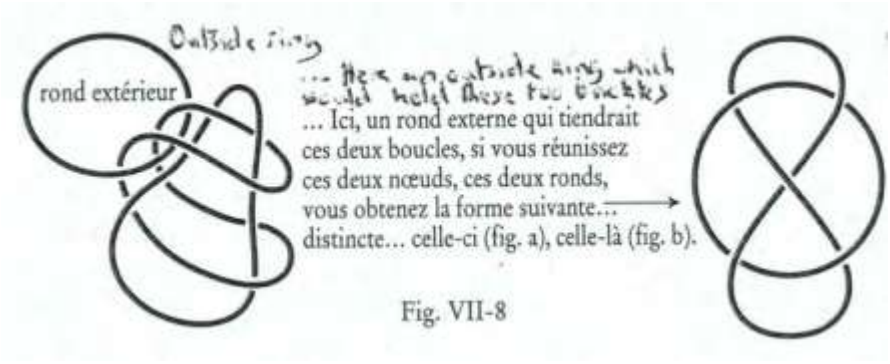

Fig. VII-8

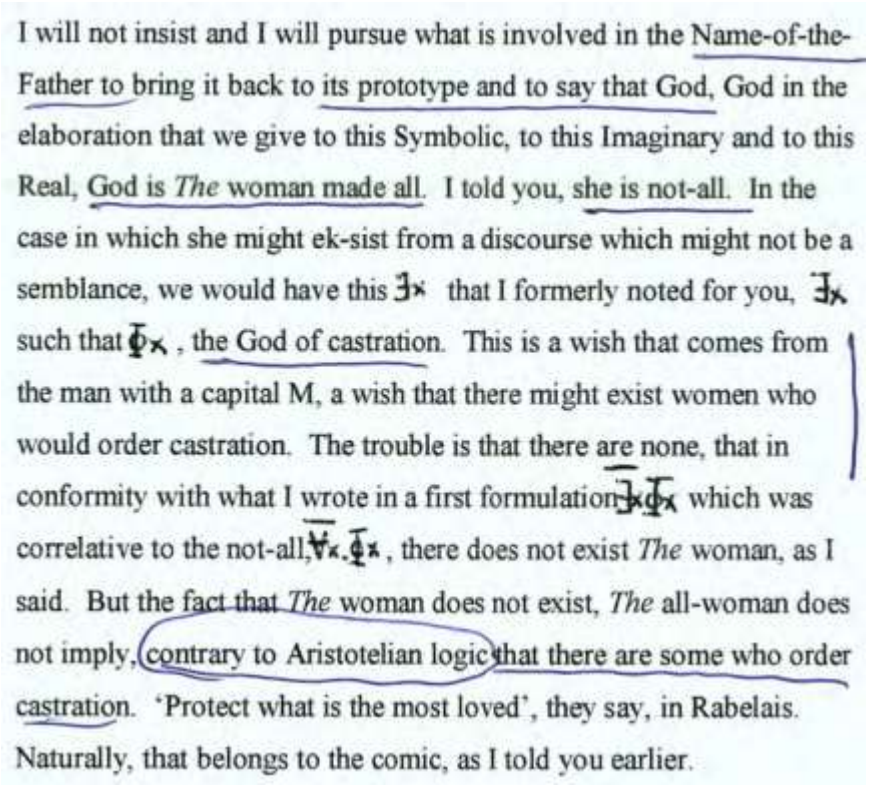
http://www.lacaninireland.com



I will not insist and I will pursue what is involved in the Name-of-the-Father to bring it back to its prototype and to say that God, God in the elaboration that we give to this Symbolic, to this Imaginary and to this Real, God is The woman made all. I told you, she is not-all. In the case in which she might ek-sist from a discourse which might not be a semblance, we would have this $\exists x$ that I formerly noted for you, $\overline{\exists}x$ such that Φx, the God of castration. This is a wish that comes from the man with a capital M, a wish that there might exist women who would order castration. The trouble is that there are none, that in conformity with what I wrote in a first formulation $\overline{\exists}x \overline{\Phi}x$ which was correlative to the not-all, $\overline{\forall}x.\overline{\Phi}x$, there does not exist The woman, as I said. But the fact that The woman does not exist, The all-woman does not imply, contrary to Aristotelian logic, that there are some who order castration. 'Protect what is the most loved', they say, in Rabelais. Naturally, that belongs to the comic, as I told you earlier.

(114) This nevertheless not-all, does not mean that any one of them say the contrary, that there exists an x of the woman who formulates the 'do not protect it'; very little for them, the nay-saying. They simply say nothing. They say nothing, except as The-all (La-toute) which I said earlier was God, The-all, if she existed. There are none to carry castration for the Other and this has got to the point that it does not prevent her, as they say, wanting the phallus for herself as I indicated earlier. There is nothing more phallogocentric, as was written somewhere about me, there is nothing more phallogocentric than a woman, except for the fact none ne-toute wants the aforesaid phallus. Each of them of course want it, except for the fact that this does not weigh too heavily on them. It is just like what I highlighted in the dream described as that of the butcher's beautiful wife. She indeed does want some of the smoked salmon as you know on condition of not making use of it. She only gives it in the measure that she does not have it. This is what is called love. It is even the definition that I gave of it, to give what one does not have, is love. It is the love of women, in so far, namely, that it is true that one by one,

http://www.lacaninireland.com

they ek-sist. They are real and even terribly so, they are even nothing but that. They only consist in so far as the symbolic ek-sists, namely, what I was saying earlier, the unconscious. This indeed is how they ek-sist as symptom, the consistency of which is provoked by this unconscious, this apparently in the flattened out field of the Real. This is what must be called really, which means, not enough attention is paid to this distinction between the adverb and the adjective, to the way of the Real, but in reality to the way in which there is imagined in the Real. I do not need to redo this schema, I think, in which there is imagined in the Real the effect of the Symbolic. [On the board] This is something all the same that I must draw, yeah! Voilà. Here is the symptom, the effect of the Symbolic in so far as it appears in the Real, and even it is in this direction here.

I apologise to Soury who sent me a very beautiful little schema concerning the Borromean knot about which I will not have the time to speak today. I am going all the same to indicate something to him, which is that the two schemas that he sent me precisely involve an orientation, a direction. In other words, that these three essential elements of the Borromean knot are orientated in what I might call a centrifugal way. To which he opposes to me the contrary form, that in which the three are – did I say centrifugal just now? It was a slip – centripetal, to which he opposes me with the centrifugal form. I am (115) pointing out this to him like that in passing, which is that by not identifying, namely, colouring the three rings, by not specifying which is the Symbolic and which is the Real, these knots, very far from being untransformable into one another, are only the same, seen from another side. I ought to add to it the fact that if you make of this the Real, by taking things from the other side, the Real and the Symbolic are inverted, which is not foreseen in his schema. And that leaves nevertheless intact for us the question as to whether, the one that I asked earlier, whether it is indifferent that in this form [VII-4] this form that is not flattened out, that in this form the order ek-sists or does not ek-sist. I am allowing myself to signal to him that there is a distinction between the order of the three terms, the orientation given to each one and the equivalence of the knots.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

This having been said, I could and I point out that the idea of supplying for the unreal woman, is not for nothing. That the imbeciles of L'amour fou call themselves Surrealists. They were themselves, I should say, symptoms, symptoms of the post-war of 14-18, except for being social symptoms. But it is not said either that what is social is not linked to a knot of resemblance. Their idea then of supplying for the woman who does not ek-sist as The, to the woman about whom I said in short that she was the very type of wandering (l'errance), put them back into the angle, into the rut of the Name-of-the-Father, of the Father as naming, about whom I said that it was a thing that came out of the Bible, but about which I add that it is for man a way of getting out of the phallic venture without loss.

That a God, good God, as tribal as the others but perhaps used with a greater purity of means, does not prevent the fact that we must touch the weight of it, in the same way as operating with this knot. The fact is that this tribal God, whether it is this one or indeed another, is only the quite useless complement, that is what this expresses, of the conjugation of this knot four to the Symbolic [VII-3]. It is the quite useless complement of the fact that it is the signifier one and without a hole, without a hole that it is permitted to use in the Borromean knot, which, to the body of the man a-sexed in itself, Freud underlines, gives the partner what she is lacking. Which she is lacking how? By the fact that he is, as I might say aphligé, aphligé to be written like that, really aphligé by a phallus which is what prohibits for him the enjoyment of the body of the other. He would need an Other of the Other for the body of the Other should not be for his a semblance, for (116) him not to be so different from animals, of not being able like all sexed animals to make of the female, the God of his life. For the mental of man, namely, the Imaginary, there is the affliction of the phallic Real because of which he does not know how to be anything

http://www.lacaninireland.com

but the semblance of power. The Real, is meaning in a blank, in other words the blank meaning by which the body pretends (fait semblant). A semblance on which there is grounded all discourse, in the first rank, the discourse of the Master which makes of the phallus the signifier index 1. Which does not prevent that if in the unconscious there were not a crowd of signifier to copulate among one another, to be indexed by flourishing two by two, there would be no chance that the idea of a subject, of a pathème of the phallus of which the signifier is the One who essentially divides him, would come to light. Thanks to which he sees that there is unconscious knowledge, namely, unconscious copulation. Hence the crazy idea of making this knowledge a semblance in its turn with respect to what partner? If not the product of what is produced, by a blind copulation, make no mistake, for only signifiers copulate among one another in the unconscious, but the pathèmatiques subjects that result from it in the form of body are led, good God, to do the same, they call that fucking. It is not a bad formula. Because something warned them that they could do no better than to suck the body signified other, other simply because of some writing in a civil register. To enjoy it, what would be called to enjoy it like that, it would have to be torn to pieces, huh! Not that there are not in the other body dispositions for it, like that, being born prematurely, it is not inconceivable. The concept here is not lacking. It is called sadomasochism, I do not know why. But it can only be dreamt from the unconscious naturally since it is the path about which it must be said, about which it must be said that it is a slap in the face to call it royal.

King, another name, another name in the business and about which everyone knows that it always springs from the business of the Name-of-the-Father. But it is a name to lose like the others, to let drop in its perpetuity. The Names-of-the-Father huh! The Anons of the Father, what a herd had I not prepared to do it, or to shove their braying back down their throats if I had not done my seminar. I would have h-uni, a word that comes from the hune woman, some new stupidity. But why these hanes-à-liste, a waiting list of course, were queuing at the doors of the Interfamilial Analytic Association and Anna was humming/Freuding in the corridor the return to the cradle by making (117) up for me upper crust motions? I am certainly not insensible to the weariness of ek-sisting (d'ek-sisterre) Land (terre)! Land! that one always believes one will reach! At last! I have only persevered in my impetus ever since. 'Laurent, bring my hairshirt and my discipline' [Molière], because this one benefits from it.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

http://www.lacaninireland.com

Seminar 8: Tuesday 18 March 1975

- Soury, where are you? Good! So then have you distributed them? I saw, huh! Good, you have distributed how many of them?
- There are three texts each of 150 copies.
- What?
- There are three texts with 150 copies each.
- Yeah! So nobody has them! That's very annoying! You had told me that you would make…distribute 500?
- We can bring more the next time, but there we only brought 150.
- Yes, no but it's already very kind of you, I am not reproaching you, it is already very kind of you only, only it is…some people are not going to have it. They are not going to have it moreover uniquely because others have it!

Good! So then I am forced to say, for those who do not have it, what there is in these papers that Pierre Soury and Michel Thomé have distributed. There is this something that you saw the last time, I cannot say the explanation of, because precisely I did not really explain it, this drawing which, it seems to me, in so far as I know something about it, which is a discovery, a discovery that Michel Thomé made on a certain figure 6 which is somewhere in my last (120) nseminar, that which is called, which is entitled Encore. He made there the discovery of an error, an error in this drawing.

I presume, I cannot say any more about it, I presume that it is a lucky error, felix culpa, as they say. It is a fortunate error if it is on the occasion of this error that Michel Thomé – but perhaps he invented it all by himself – invented all by himself what I have indicated – in short, the last time, in one of these pages that I have had stuck to the board – and which demonstrates that there is in short, that it is possible to depict, I am not saying to write, to depict the Borromean knots, in such a way, let us things rapidly, that they only come undone from one end, starting from one end. If – ah! it's not easy! – if we attack any one of them, any one at all of the rings of string that are knotted in a certain way, precisely in a non-Borromean way since if it were Borromean, it would be enough to break any one of them at all for all the others to be immediately independent of one another, while the definition of these knots, of these knots such that they only come undone from one end signifies that in attacking any one whatsoever, it is only in one direction, and not in the other, that all are unknotted, but in the direction where all are unknotted, it is one by one and not immediately that they are unknotted.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

I do not know whether it was on the occasion of this error or off his own bat that Michel Thomé made what I called earlier this discovery. He is perhaps there, so let him say it! Is he there?

- You made this discovery on the occasion of the error? It was on the occasion of the error? Yes? It is indeed what I am saying, it is a lucky error! But this proves at least the following, the fact is – I must admit my surprise because I do not get proof of it every day – that I do not speak absolutely without effect. You will tell me that I cannot measure these effects since I am not given any trace of them. But in short, precisely, it something about which I know thanks to this couple of friends, Soury and Thomé, to have given me a trace of it, it is encouraging all the same! I would like from time to time to have other traces of it! It must be said that people look twice at it before giving it to me, not unreasonably moreover because it might well be that the traces that I collect, are not as solid, are not such well-made knots.

That obviously gives an idea that these knots are something rather (121) original, I would say, with the ambiguity perhaps, I am not sure, of original. What they would confirm, is that it is not so easy to go back, and then, the original does not mean that it is from there that one starts. It is even quite sure that historically well let us say…the Borromean knot was not found under a horses hoof! It was very late when people got interested in it. Let us say that, if in fact I have the shadow of a merit, I do not know what that means moreover, merit, it is that when I got wind of this thing, the Borromean knot – I found that in the notes of a person that I meet from time to time and who had picked it up at Guilbaud's seminar – there is one things certain, it is that I immediately had, in short, the certainty that it was something precious. Precious for me, for what I had to explain.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

I immediately related this knot to what from then on, appeared to me like rings of string. Something provided with a particular consistency, that remains to be supported and which was for me recognisable in what I had stated from the start of my teaching. Which, no doubt, I would not have expressed, being little inclined to it by nature, without an appeal, an appeal linked in a more or less contingent way, to let us say a crisis in analytic discourse. It is possible that with time, I would have glimpsed that this crisis all the same would have to be unknotted, but circumstances were required for me to pass into action.

So then, these Borromean knots came to me like a ring on the finger and I immediately knew that this had a relationship that put the Symbolic, the Imaginary and the Real into a certain position with respect to one another, about which the knot encouraged me to state something which, as I already said here, homogenised them. What is meant by homogenised? It is obviously, as Pierre Soury previously remarked in a little note that he communicated to me, because I am very keen to give everyone his due, that they have something similar. As the same Pierre Soury remarked to me 'between the similar and the same' – that's from him – between the similar and the same, there is room for a difference. But it is very precisely in putting the accent on the similar in that that homogenisation consists, the pushing forward of the homoios which is not the same, which is similar.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

What is similar about them? Well then, this is what I believe I have to (122) designate by the term of consistency, which is already to put forward something unbelievable! What can the consistency of the Imaginary, that of the Symbolic and that of the Real have in common? By this mode, this statement, do I make tangible for you - it seems to me that it is difficult to make it more tangible for you - that the term consistency henceforth belongs to the Imaginary?

Yeah! Here I stop to make a parenthesis designed to show you that the knot is not easy to depict. I am not saying to depict it to oneself, because in this business I eliminate completely the subject who is depicting it, since I start from the thesis that the subject is what is determined by the figure in question, determined, not that in any way he is the double of it, but that it is by the squeezing of the knot, of what in the knot determines the triple points from the fact of the tightening of the knot that the subject is conditioned. I am going perhaps later to remind you of this in the form of a drawing on the board. In any case, to depict this knot is not easy. I already gave you the proof in messing about more or less myself with one or other little drawings that I made. In any case the last episode of my relationships with the aforenamed Pierre Soury consists, make no mistake, in something which is certainly very strange, it is that after having acceded on one occasion to what he had put forward, put forward very correctly, namely, that there was in the Real of the Borromean knot, a Real to which you add the fact that you orientate each of these rings.

To orientate it is a business which only seems to concern each one of the rings. There is supposed to be another way, let us not say of recognising these rings, for recognise would already be to enter into all sorts of implications, let us say differentiating them, which would be to colour them. You clearly sense the whole distance there is between colouring, and this is something that ought to come in at the level where Goethe took up things: but there is not the slightest trace of it in The theory of colours, and a level where that by which colour is something which is heavy with differentiation. Obviously, there is a limit, namely, that there are not an infinite number of colours. There are nuances no doubt. But thanks to the colour, there is difference.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

I had asked the question at one of my preceding seminars, whether these knots, I had taken one, a bit more complicated than the (123) Borromean knot of three, not that they were not three, but I had asked the question of whether this knot was only one, namely, whether the introduction of differentiation into the knot left the knot not similar, but always the same. It is effectively always the same, but there is only a single way of demonstrating it, which is to demonstrate that in every case – what is meant by 'case'? – it is reducible to the similar.

This indeed in effect is what happened. In fact I was in effect quite convinced that there is only one coloured knot, but I had a vacillation, which is what I call my last adventure concerning the orientated knot. Because oriented concerns a yes or a no for each one of these knots and I allowed myself, there, to stray by way of something that stems from the relationship of each one of these yeses or no with the two others. And for a moment, I said to myself – I did not go as far as to say to myself that there were eight knots, I'm not that stupid! Namely, 2 x 2 x 2, yes or no x yes or no x yes or no. I did not even go so far as to think that there were four of them, but I do not know why I was racking my brain over the fact that there were two of them and it is not all the same something that does not have a bearing. That after having asked in an explicit way, I obtained from Pierre Soury, who, I hope, will distribute it to you the next time, I obtained, am I going to say the demonstration, what I asked for, namely, the showing (monstration) that there is only one orientated Borromean knot. The showing in question, that Pierre Soury communicated to me within a time span, as I might say – he is not without merit – he had to [wrestle with it], it is a shaky thing to demonstrate, he provided me in time for me to read it and for me to be quite convinced of it, the showing, not the demonstration, the showing that in terms of orientated knot there is only one, well and truly the same.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

The only thing that this leads us to, and here I am challenging him, is the following. It is that this similar he reduces to the same, he can only do it starting from the fact that this something about which I am questioning him on this occasion. It is why it is required for this showing to be depicted, why must it pass by way of what I am calling, and what I already called, my flattening-out of the knot? It is something that deserved to be individualised, this flattening-out. Because, as I think you have already seen by this pencil sketch that I had to make on the board, namely, flattened-out, a perspective pencil sketch, you have indeed been able to see that if this knot is not of its nature a flat knot, far from it, the fact that it has to pass by way of the (124) flattening-out to highlight the sameness of the knot, whatever may be the orientation that you give to each one, which, I already made you sense it, indicated, will evoke that there will be eight of them, I told you that I did not let myself be taken in. But anyway all the same I still got bogged down in thinking that there were two of them. This simply proves the extraordinary debility of thought, at least of mine and in a general fashion that thought, the one that proceeds by way of what I said earlier in terms of a yes or a no, thought, must be looked at twice before accepting what must indeed be entitled its verdict.

Is there not, as I might say, a sort of fatum of thought which, in attaching it too closely to the true, allows there to slip between its fingers, as I might say, the Real? This indeed is what I brought out the last time by a remark on the concept in so far as the concept is not the same thing as the truth; in so far as the concept is limited to a grasp as the word capere implies, and that a grasp is not enough to be sure that it is the Real that one has in one's hand.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

There you are! These remarks that I am making to you that you have, I do not know why, the patience to accept, mean that it is impossible for me to warn you at every instant about what I am doing in speaking to you. That I am doing something that concerns you, your presence proves, but that is not enough to say the mode under which this is happening. To say that you comprehend something about it is not even certain, not certain at the level that what I am saying is sustained. But there is something worthwhile and it is indeed because of situating this thing, I am saying it in this way, that we comprehend one another. It is difficult not to sense, in the very text of what is said, in the sense that we comprehend one another has no other substratum than we embrace one another. And I see all the same that this is not quite what we are doing, and that there is here an equivocation, an equivocation which, it must be said, like all equivocations has an aspect of smut, to call things by their name. And what I strive to do, let us say, is to put a bit of humour into the recognition of this smut as a presence. This indeed is what gives its weight to the way I cut the knot in stating this point whose bearing should be clearly specified, that there is no sexual relationship.

What does that mean when I say it? It does not mean that we do not find the sexual relationship at every street corner! And that in (125) highlighting that everything must be re-centred on this scumble, this stew, to appeal to what! To the Real, to the Real of the knot. Freud obviously did not take a step, a step which moreover consisted, is that not so quite simply in noticing that from all time people spoke about nothing but that, that everything that was done in terms of philosophy oozed the sexual relationship from every pore.

So then, what does it mean when I state that there is no sexual relationship? It is to designate a very local point, to manifest the logic of the relation, to mark that R to designate the relation, or to be put between x and y, is to enter here and now into the operation of writing, and that, as regards what is involved in the sexual relationship, it is strictly impossible to write x R y, in any way, that no elaboration of the sexual relationship can be made that is logical and at the same time mathematical. This is exactly the accent that I put on this statement there is no sexual relationship, and this then is to say that without having recourse to different consistencies – for the moment I am only taking them as consistencies – to these different consistencies which nevertheless are distinguished by being named Imaginary, Symbolic and Real, without the recourse to these consistencies in so far as they are different, there is no possibility of this scumble. That there is no reduction possible of the difference of these consistencies to something that will be simply written in a way that is supported, I mean that resists the test of mathematics and which allows the sexual relationship to be assured.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

These modes which are those under which I took the floor, Symbolic Imaginary and Real. I would not say at all that they are obvious (évidents). I strive simply to empty them (les é-vider), which does not mean the same thing because to empty out is based on a void and that the obvious is based on seeing. Does this mean that I believe in it? I believe in it in the sense that it affects me as a symptom. I already said what the symptom owed to believing in it (l'y croire) and what I strive to do, what I try, is to give to this I believe in it a different form of credibility. It is certain that I will fail at it. It is not a reason for not undertaking it, if only to demonstrate something which is the beginning of the impossible, already my impotence.

The knot is supposed by me to be the Real in the fact that it determines as ek-sistence, I mean, in that by which it forces a certain mode of turning-around, the mode under which there ek-sists a ring of string with respect to another, it is in this that I have managed to shift the question, insoluble of itself, of objectivity.

(126) This seems to me less silly, objectivity thus shifted seems to me to be less silly than the noumenon; because, try to think a little about what people persisted at for more than two millennia of history the noumenon, conceived in opposition to the phenomenon. It is strictly impossible not to bring out in its connection – but as you are going to see it is in retrospect – not to bring out in its connection the metaphor of the hole. Nothing to say about the noumenon, except that perception has the value of deception. But why here not remark that it is we who say that this perception is deceptive? For perception properly speaking says nothing precisely. It does not say, it is we who make it say, we talk all by ourselves. This indeed is what I am saying, in connection with any saying whatsoever, we lend our voice. The saying is a consequence, it is not the voice, the saying is an act.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

So then, if the noumenon is nothing other than what I have stated as a hole, perhaps this hole, by finding it named as such in our Symbolic starting from the topology of the torus, of the torus qua distinguished from the sphere by a mode of writing by which there are defined as a matter of fact homo- as well as homeo - , as well as auto-morphism, whose foundation is always the possibility of being founded on what is called a continuous distortion and a distortion which is defined by encountering what creates an obstacle – that is what topology is - to another cord that is supposed to consist, this is what makes the torus, t-o-r-u-s, that I would be happy to call here the tube-torus (tore-boyau).

In order to depict for you the torus in a way that may be tangible do I…[on the board] Here is a torus [VIII-1], make a hole in it, put in your hand and catch what is at the centre, the centre of the torus. That leaves like that a feeling of which the least that can be said is that there is a discordance between this hand and what it squeezes.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

Fig. VIII-1

(127) There is a way other than that to show it, which would be to suppose another torus inside the torus [VIII-2]. How far can one go like that? You must not believe that it is enough here to place another inside the second torus, because this would not at all be something homogenous despite the appearance given by the cup (coupe), that would not be something homogenous to what is depicted here.

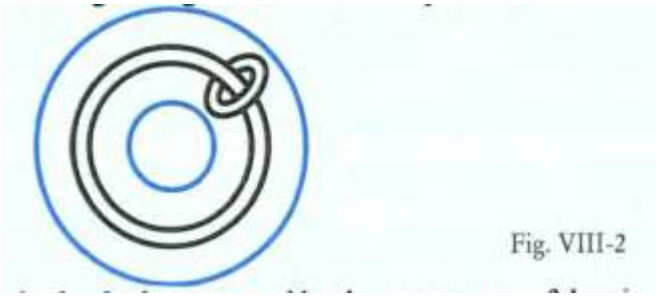

Fig. VIII-2

[On the board] As is clearly demonstrated by the correct way of drawing a torus, when one does it in a mathematical way [VIII-3] it would have to be another ring placed here [VIII-2] in order for this one to be, equivalent to the one that I first cut to give here the figure of the torus.

Fig. VIII-3

In short, if these cords supposed to consist give some support to the metaphor of the hole, it is only starting from the topology of the torus in so far as it elaborates mathematically the difference between an implicit…topology and a topology which, by being distinguished from it, becomes explicit, namely, the sphere, in so far as every supposition of the Imaginary participates first of all implicitly in this sphere in so far as it radiates. Let there be light! That is not a tube-torus!

http://www.lacaninireland.com

The annoying thing, this is what analysis reveals concerning what is involved in the consistency of the body, it is to the tube that one must come instead of the polyhedrons which occupied the 'Timaean', 'Timaeic' imagination throughout the centuries. It is what I earlier called the tube-torus that prevails, and when I say tube-torus, that is (128) not enough, as you see sufficiently from these drawings, it is not enough to orientate things towards the tube, it is as a matter of fact a sphincter.

Here we are then, in what renders more tangible than anything, the relationship of the body to the Imaginary, and what I want to point out to you is the following: can one think the Imaginary, the Imaginary itself in so far as we are caught up in it by our bodies, can one think the Imaginary as imaginary to reduce, as I might say imaginariness or imaginarity, as you wish? One is in the Imaginary, that is what must be recalled. However elaborated you makes it, this is what analysis brings you back to; however elaborated you make it, in the Imaginary, you are. There is no way of reducing it in its imaginarity. It is in this that topology takes a step. It allows you to think, but it is a retrospective thought, that aesthetics, that what you sense, in other words, is not in itself, as they say, transcendental, that it is linked to what we can very well conceive of as contingency, namely, that it is this topology that is valid for a body. Again it is not a body all by itself! If there were not the Symbolic and the ek-sistence of the Real, this body would simply have no aesthetics at all, because it would have no tube-torus. The tube-torus, torus with the hyphen as I write it, is a mathematical construction, namely, made of this inek-sistent relationship, qua ek-sistent, that there is between the Symbolic and the Real. The notion of knot that I am putting forward can no doubt be imagined, as I said, be depicted between the Imaginary the Symbolic and the Real, without loosing for all that its weight of Real, but precisely why? Because there is an effective knot, namely, that the cords are squeezed, that there are these cases where the ek-sistence, the turning around, no longer happens because of these triple points whose ek-sistence is suppressed. This is what I indicated in telling you that the Real is demonstrated as having no meaning, having no meaning because it begins. Because it begins with what?

http://www.lacaninireland.com

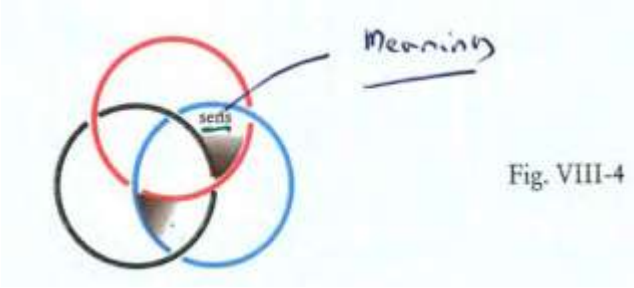

Fig. VIII-4

[On the board] With the fact that here, if this Real, to indicate it, if this Symbolic to indicate it by a different colour, I make in this way, reducing the place, the one that I indicated as being that of small o, I reduce meaning to this triple point that is here. Only this meaning, qua vanishing gives meaning to the term of Real. In the same way, here, at this other triple point which is defined by this corner, it is enjoyment qua phallic that implies its liaison to the Imaginary as ek-sistence, the Imaginary is the pas-de-jouissance (the step/not of enjoyment). Just as for the Symbolic, it is very specifically that there is no Other of the Other which gives it its consistency.

Does that mean that all of these are only models? I already said and put forward, which is no reason for me not to repeat it, that models have recourse as such to the pure Imaginary, the knots have recourse to the Real and take their value from the fact that they have no less bearing in the mental than the Real, even if the mental is Imaginary for the good reason that they have their bearing on the two. Any couple, anything involved in the couple is reduced to the Imaginary. Negation is also a way of acknowledging, Verneinung, Freud insists on it from the start, a way of acknowledging where alone, the acknowledgement is possible because the Imaginary is the place where all truth is stated and a truth denied has just as much Imaginary weight as an acknowledged truth, Verneinung as Bejahung.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

How does it happen, this is the question that I ask in bringing you the answer, that the Real only begins with number 3 (chiffre 3)? All Imaginary has something of the 2 involved, as I might say, as a remainder of this 2 effaced from the Real. This indeed is why the 2 ek-sists with respect to the Real, and that it is not out of place to confirm that ek-sistence, namely, what plays on every cord as ek-sistence, has the consistency of the others. That this ek-sistence, namely, this operation, this limited field, where the trajectory or the path as someone said to me recently someone who was speaking to me about this subject, which again is nobody but Soury, that the ek-sistence, the operation of the cord up to the point that something squeezes is indeed the zone where one can say that consistency, the consistency of the Real, namely, what Freud put the accent on, renewed the accent, no doubt using an ancient term, the phallus. But how know what the Mysteries put under this term of phallus? By accentuating it, Freud exhausted himself, but it is in no other way than (130) by its flattening-out. Now, what is at stake is to give its whole weight to this consistency, not simply the ek-sistence of the Real. To name, to name (nommer) that moreover you could n-apostrophe-h-o-two ms-e-r, write n'hommer. To say is an act; what makes saying an act, is the adding of a dimension, a dimension of flattening-out.

No doubt, in what I encouraged Pierre Soury to share with us just now, namely, his demonstration of the fact that there is only one knot, by taking it as orientated, he distinguishes all sorts of elements that only stem from the flattening-out: the turning over of planes, the turning over of rings, the turning over of bands, indeed internal or external exchanges. These are only, you will read them, at least I hope so, these are only the effects of the flattening-out as regards which it would be well to highlight that there is here only a recourse, an exemplary recourse to the distance there is between the Real of the knot and this conjunction of domains, the one that is inscribed, that I inscribed here earlier on the board to give weight to meaning. That all of this may illuminate, illuminate in fact the practice of a discourse, of the discourse properly called analytic, is what I will leave you to decide, without making any more concessions today. I acknowledge, I did not make many of them. But consult simply these terms such as the ones that Freud puts forward concerning what he calls identification. I am proposing to you in closing this session today the fact that identification, the triple identification as he puts it forward, I am formulating the way in which I define it: if there is a real Other, it is nowhere else than in the knot itself and that is why there is no Other of the Other. This real Other, make yourselves identify yourself to its Imaginary, you have then the identification of the hysteric to the desire of the Other, the one that is happening here at this central point. Identify yourselves to the Symbolic of the real Other, you have then this identification that I specified as being the einziger Zug, the unary trait. Identify yourselves to the Real of the real Other, you obtain what I indicate as the Name-of-the-Father, and that is where Freud designated what this identification has to do with love.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

I will speak the next time about three forms of the Names-of-the-father, those that name as such the Imaginary, the Symbolic and the Real, for it is in these names themselves that the knot holds up.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

Seminar 9: Tuesday 8 April 1975

Voilà! I am struck by one thing, which is that – nevertheless I searched, I searched for traces, for traces somewhere of what I call cogitation, whose cogitation, I will say later – cogitation remains limed in an Imaginary which is, as I have, let us say, suggested for a long time, the Imaginary of the body. What is cogitated – you must not believe that I put the emphasis on the Symbolic – what is cogitated is in a way, retained by the Imaginary as rooted in the body. Well then, it strikes me not to have, not to be able, in the literature which is not simply philosophical - philosophy is moreover in no way to be distinguished from the artistic, from the literary…I am going to emphasise that progressively, is that not so? And to put my cards immediately on the table, I am going to announce something that I will take up later.

It is hard to imagine, make no mistake, because one must stand back a little it is hard to imagine the degree to which the Imaginary is sticky and has a stickiness that I am right away going to designate, that of the sphere and of the cross. It is fearsome! I have been, in short why not say it, I have been strolling through Joyce because I was requested, like that, to speak at a Joyce congress which should take place in June. I cannot say that it is not imaginable, it is only too imaginable! It is not Joyce who is responsible for it. To be limed like that in this sphere and the cross, one can say that it is because he read a lot of St

http://www.lacaninireland.com

Thomas. Because that was what

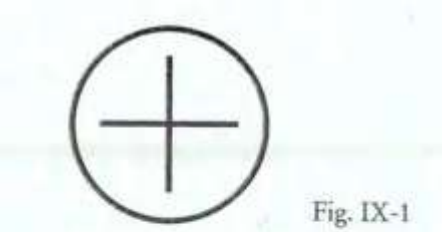

Fig. IX-1

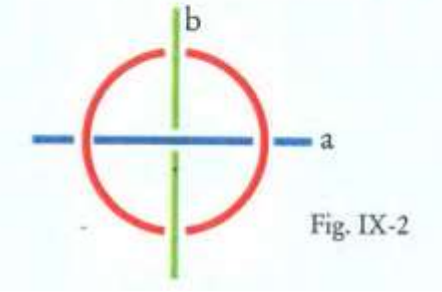

Fig. IX-2

was taught in the Jesuits where he received his formation. But it is not only due to that, you are just as limed in the (132) sphere and in the cross. It is there on the little page [IX-1] a circle, a section of a sphere, and then inside the cross. What's more that makes the + sign. You cannot imagine how much you are retained in this circle and in this + sign.

It can happen, is that not so, that by chance an artist, who sticks something in plaster on a wall, makes something that by chance is like that [IX-2]. But nobody notices that this is already the Borromean knot.

Try, like that to tackle it for yourselves. When you see it like that, what do you make of it imaginarily? You make of it two things that hook onto one another and which come back to fold over, this A and this B [IX-3], to fold them over in this way. As a result of which, the circle, the ring, the cycle, I will come back later to what that means, has only to slip over what is thus knotted.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

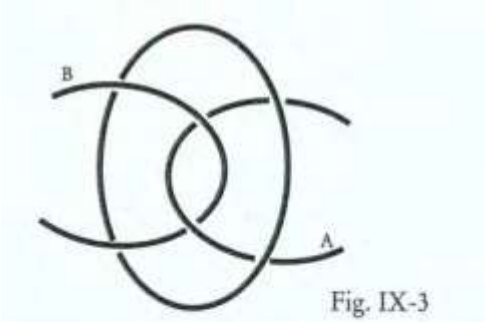

Fig. IX-3

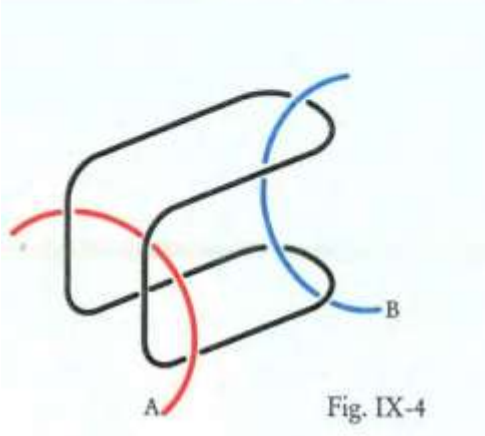

Fig. IX-4

It is not, as I might say, natural, what does natural mean? Once one approaches it, in short, it disappears, but in short, natural to your imagination, it is not natural to do exactly the opposite, namely, to distort the circle, the cycle like that [IX-4], which seems to be dictated for all that, in short, if one (133) makes a simply different use of A and B.. That is a fact, it is a fact of which the least that can be said is that it is curious that I should be interested in the Borromean knot because you can be sure that the Borromean knot is not obligatorily what I have drawn for you a hundred times. Is that not so in fact! That is also a Borromean knot [IX-5], just as valid as that in the form in which I usually flatten it out. It is a true Borromean knot, I mean this one.

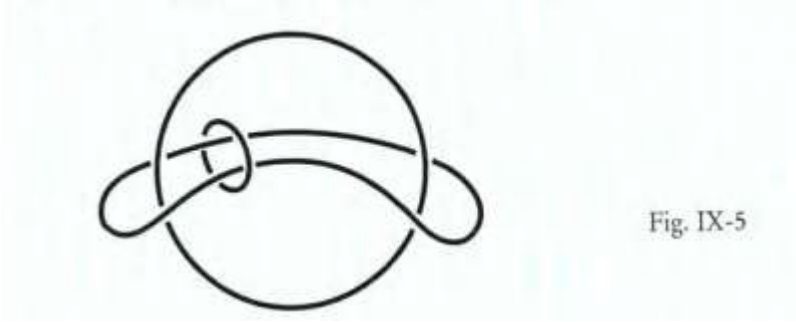

Fig. IX-5

http://www.lacaninireland.com

Look at it closely, I already said that if I was, like that, gripped one day by the Borromean knot, it is altogether linked to this order of event or advent, as you wish, that is called the analytic discourse, and in so far as I defined it as a social bond emerging in our day. This discourse has a historic value that has to be mapped out. It is true that mine is a weak voice to sustain it, but it is perhaps so much the better because if it were stronger, well then I would perhaps in short have less chance of subsisting. I mean that it seems difficult to me, throughout all history, like that, for the social bonds prevalent up to now not to silence any voice that is designed to sustain a different emerging discourse. This is what has always been seen up to now and it is not because there is no longer the Inquisition that it should be believed that the social links that I defined, the discourse of the master the discourse of the university, indeed the hysterico-diabolic discourse should not stifle, as I might say, whatever voice I may have. This having been said in short, I within this, I am a subject. I am caught up in this business, like that, because I set about existing as an analyst. That does not mean that I believe that I have a mission of truth. There were people like that, in short, in the past, who were crackers. No mission of the truth because the truth, I insist, cannot be said, it can only be half-said. So then let us rejoice that my voice is low….

(134) In every philosophy…Up to the present like that, there is philosophy, the right one, huh, the current one, and then from time to time there are crazy people who precisely believe they have a mission of truth; the whole thing is simply buffoonery! But that I should say so has no importance, luckily for me, I am not believed! Because when all is said and done, believe this for the time being, the right dominates, the right philosophy, it is indeed still there. I made, like that, a little visit during these holidays, as a way of making him a little sign before both of us disintegrate, to someone called Heidegger. In fact I am very fond of him. He is still very stout hearted…There is already something that he is trying to get out of. There is something in him like a, like a presentiment of sicanalise, as Aragon said. But it is only a presentiment because Freud, in short he does not what way to turn when he…it does not interest him.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

Nevertheless something emerged through him, through Freud, is that not so? Yes, whose consequences I am drawing out, by weighing it in its effects which are no small thing. But this supposes, this would suppose that the psychoanalyst ek-sists, ek-sists a little bit more. Anyway! He has already begun…there is already that, huh, begun to ek-sist, there, as I write it. But what to do so that the knot to which I have come, there, not of course without getting entangled in it just as much as you, what to do to make him tighten this knot, to the point that the speaking being as I call him, no longer believes, no longer believes what? That outside the being of speaking, he believes in being, huh! Is it too crude to say that it is uniquely because there is the verb to be? No, that is why I said the being of speaking. He believes that because he speaks, well then that is where his salvation lies. It is a track (erre) and I would even say a unary track (trait-une-erre). Yes! It is thanks to this that what I will call an orientated decoding has prevailed in what is called thought, the thought that is described as human. I am letting myself go like that, something gets into me from time to time, and I would say that this track deserves rather to be pinpointed by the words on the move (transhumant), its so called humanity depending only on a naturalness of transit, like that – and what is more, which postulates transcendence…

My success as I might say, which has of course no connotation of a result to my eyes and with good reason…I only believe, like Freud, in the bungled action, but in the bungled action in so far as it is revelatory of the site, of the situation of the transit in question, with *transfe*r in one's grasp of course, all of that, gives something of the trans [trance?]. This trans must simply be brought back to its proper (135) measure. My success then, my succession, that's what that means, will it remain in this transitory? Well then this is the best thing that could happen to it because in any case there is no chance that the humant-trans should ever tackle anything whatsoever. So then just as well have an endless peregrination! Simply Freud made the remark that there is perhaps a saying which takes on the validity that I am going to tell you, as only being up to now forbidden (interdit). That means to say between, nothing more, between the lines. This is what he called, like that, the repressed. Naturally, I am not going to get up on my high horse. But why, if really as I have just said, there is not, even in people who would be made in a way to meet it, no trace of this Borromean knot, despite what I am telling you, since the sphere and the cross, can be found everywhere, someone might have noticed that this could make a Borromean knot, as I have just explained to you.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

Good, as it happens I made this discovery of the Borromean knot, without looking for it of course! It seems to me like that, it must also appear like that to you, of course, that seems to me to be a notable discovery in order to salvage not the air of Freud, a-i-r, but precisely his track (erre), what exists of it, which is rigorously a matter of the knot. Good! Now let us pass on to something like that, to get our teeth into – and this [IX-2] is what is important; why the devil did no one draw this plus which consists in writing this sign like that, in the proper way? [IX-4]

There is all the same someone, like that, who one day, you do not remember, of course, because you have not read all of Aragon – who reads the whole of Aragon! – there is a passage in the young Aragon, where he begins to fume, I mean to get heated up, by claiming that at one time…who went so far as to suppress the crossroads, quadrivii, he was thinking of autoroutes, because autoroute is a rather funny word huh! What is meant by an auto-route? A road in itself or a road for itself? Anyway, who found this time, there are still a lot of crossroads, a lot of street corners, of course! In short, I do not know what got into him, like that, to think that there would no longer be any crossroads, that there would always be subterranean passages, that this time deserves a better fate than to remain in general theology? What is curious is that he in no way drew a conclusion. That is the surrealist mode, is that not so? It never culminates in anything. He did not spatialise the Borromean knot in the right way. Thanks to which, is (136) that not so, we are still at being, as Heidegger said to me there, that I was able earlier to extract from his brain, being in-der-Welt, at in-der-Welt-sein. It is a cosmeticology, which is also cosmeticological. It is a tradition like that, thanks to what? Thanks to this Welt there is a Umwelt and then there is a Innenwelt. This should make you suspicious, this repetition of the bubble (bulle) yes I learned that in cartoons it is by bubbles, I had never noticed it, because I should tell the truth, I never look at cartoons. In short I am ashamed, I am ashamed because it is marvellous is it not? They are not even cartoons, they are photo-montages, in short they are sublime! They are photo-montages, and I read in Nous deux photo-montages with words! And then thoughts, is when there are bubbles!

http://www.lacaninireland.com

I don't know why you are laughing, because for you this is familiar! At least I suppose so because…yes! Does the question I am asking here in the form of this bubble prove that the Real makes up a universe? It is here, the question that I ask, it is one that I asked starting from Freud, in something which is only a beginning, which is that Freud suggested that this universe had a hole. And what is more, a hole that there is no way of knowing. So then I follow the track of this hole, as I might say, and I encounter, it is not I who invented it, I encounter the Borromean knot which, as they always say, fits me like a ring on my finger…here we again have the hole! Only there is all the same something, when one goes ahead like that in following the track of things, which is that one notices that there is not only one thing to make a cycle. It is not obligatorily and only the hole. Yes, if you take two of them, from that, from these cycles, from these things that turn, from this circle in question [IX-2], and if you knot both of them, in the right way…you must not make a mistake of course – and I must say that I make mistakes all the time, it is not only Jacques-

http://www.lacaninireland.com

Alain Miller! The proof that…look at that! When I wanted earlier to make the Borromean knot for you, that one there is shocking, I put my foot in it! Because made like that, it is not a Borromean knot. Namely, that you can always cut one of them, the two others will remain knotted. It's not the right yoke! But in short, provided you fold them in the right way, you notice that if you add this straight line to it [IX-6] nothing more than this straight line, well then! It is a Borromean knot. The straight line, infinite of course as I said, stated at the beginning of this seminar. That makes a Borromean knot that is just as valid as the one that I usually draw and that I am not going to start on again. If the straight line is an infinite straight line, and how not refer to it as the string in itself, the consistency reduced to the last it has, well then, it makes a knot! Naturally, it is much more convenient for us to close this consistency. I mean to notice that it is enough here to make a buckle to rediscover the familiar knot, the knot in the way in which I usually draw it [IX-6]. What is interesting, is that not so, in representing it in this way, is to notice that starting from there [IX-7], the way, the first, of writing the Borromean knot rebounds on this cycle [IX-6] and that it is one of the ways of showing how the knot can be, as I might say, doubly Borromean, namely, that we pass to the bo-bo knot of four.

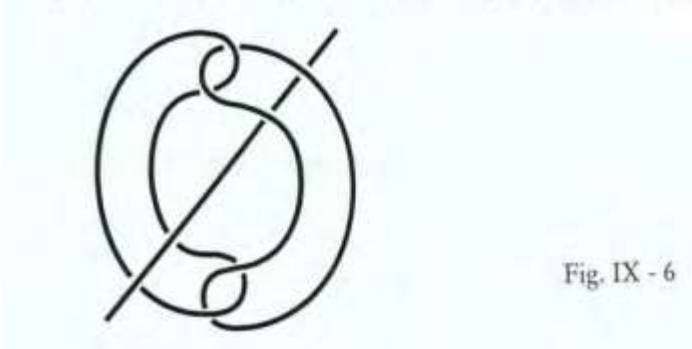

Fig. IX - 6

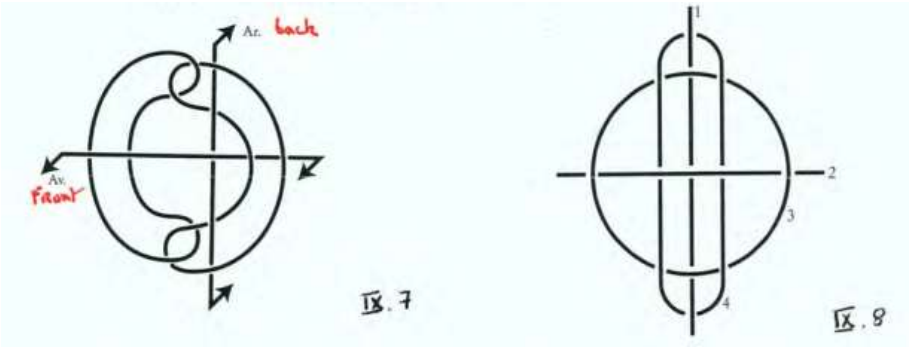
http://www.lacaninireland.com



(138) There you are! I showed you here [IX-8] another illustration of this knot of four. But the question that this poses is what is the order of equivalence of the straight line [IX-6], of the infinite straight line, as it is there, of the straight line to the cycle? There is someone, a man of genius called Desargues, to whom I made an allusion at one time – in short 'at one time', at the time when I made an allusion to him… – to whom the idea came that every straight line, every infinite straight line achieved closure, created a buckle at a point at infinity. How could this idea have come to him? It is an absolutely sublime idea around which I constructed my whole commentary on las Meninas, the one about which people say, in short, if we are to believe the hacks, was completely incomprehensible. I do not know. It did not seem to be so to me, at least! What is the equivalence of the straight line to the circle? It is obviously to make a knot. It is a consequence, is it not, of the Borromean knot. It is a recourse to efficiency, to effectiveness, to Wirklichkeit.

That is not, that is not the important thing! For if we find them equivalent in efficiency, in the efficiency of the knot, what is the difference? I am not telling you at all that I am satisfied huh! I approach, I approach so painfully, good God, that this will make you suffer, everything that concerns thinking-out-the-Borromean-knot. Because I told you, it is not easy to imagine it, which gives a proper measure of what all thinking (pensation) is, as I might say. It is all the same curious in short that even Descartes, is that not so. His Regula decima, namely, the one that I highlighted, even read for you (139) concerning what is not said literally, concerning the use of

http://www.lacaninireland.com

thread, the use of weaving, the use of what might have led him to the knot, and to the Borromean knot in particular, he never made anything of it. That he never made anything of it is a sign.

Good! So then the difference? I am not saying that it is my last word, is that not so, the difference is in the passage from the one to the other, and in something that for the moment I content myself with illustrating, with illustrating without doing it in a definitive way. The fact is that between the two, there is an interplay. And since this whole interplay only culminates in their equivalence, it is perhaps in this journey of something which, by being a cycle, buckles a hole. It is perhaps in the interplay of ek-sistence, of the track in short, of the fact that there is an interplay, in short, that this moves, that this opens as they say, that the difference consists, a difference of ek-sistence. One ek-sists, heads off into the track until it only encounters simply consistency, and the other, the other, the cycle, is centred on the hole.

Naturally, no one knows what this hole is. That the hole, should be what the emphasis is put on in the corporal by all analytic thought, well, this rather puts a stopper in the hole! It is not clear. By the fact that it is the orifice on which there is suspended everything that is involved in the pre-Oedipal as they say, that all perversity is orientated, which is that of all our behaviour, integrally, is quite strange! This is not going to illuminate the nature of the hole for us. There is something else like that that might come to mind, which is quite unrepresentable. It is what is called, in short, like that by a name that only dazzles because of language, it is what is called death. Good, that puts no less a stopper in it! Because we do not know what death is.

There is all the same an approach, an approach that is expressed in what mathematics has described as topology which envisages space differently. Note this differently, it is worthwhile remembering it. Well then, one cannot say that this leads us to notions that are all that easy. One sees clearly there the weight of imaginary inertia. Why did geometry find itself so much at ease in what it combines? Is it by adhering to the Imaginary, or is it by a sort of injection of the Symbolic? This is what would deserve to be posed as a question to a mathematician. In any case, the twisted character of this topology, the (140) establishment of notions like that of neighbourhood, indeed of accumulating point, this emphasis put on something – we see very well what the aspect is - on discontinuity as such, while manifestly there is here a resistance. Continuity is indeed a natural aspect of the imagination.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

Good, I am not going to develop this any more. What I note, is that the difficulty of the introduction, like that, of the mental to topology, the fact that it is not more easily thinkable gives a good idea of what there is to be learned from this topology as regards what is involved in our repressed.

The effective difficulty, is that not so, of cogitating about the Borro-knot, here, reduplicated by the fact that the accessibility constituted by this sphere and the cross presents it as an example of a missed mathesis, missed inexplicably by a hairs breath, never familiar in any case, why not see in the manifest aversion that this entails, the very trace of this first repression? And why not become engaged along this furrow, just like a dog who picks up a scent? Except for this of course, that the sense of smell is not what characterises us, and that we must take into account this smell effect in the dog. How? This can imitate, imitate a perception effect which would be the supplement for a lack that we must indeed admit if we have, and this is a question, had our eyes opened. If we open our eyes to the ek-sistence of the Urverdrängt, of something affirmed by analysis which is that there is a repression that is not simply first but irreducible. This is what we should be following the trace of, and this is in short what I am doing before you in so far as I am able. Naturally, all the same, I take care to tell you that I am not getting up on my high horse, I mean that I do not believe that I have found here the last word, not at all! To think that one has found the last word, would be properly speaking paranoia. Paranoia, is not that, paranoia is being stuck in the Imaginary. It is the voice that sounds, the look that becomes all-prevailing it is a matter of the congealing of a desire. But in short, all the same that would be paranoia, Freud told us not to worry. I mean to say why not? This could be a vein to follow, huh! There is no need to be so afraid if that leads us somewhere! It is quite clear that this has only ever led to…well to the truth. Which indeed makes it the measure of the truth itself, namely, what the paranoia of President Schreber shows, which is that there is no sexual relationship except (141) with God. It's the truth! And it is indeed what puts in question the ek-sistence of God, we are here in something failed in creation, if I can thus express myself. The saying is to trust something which, probably dupes us. But to not be its dupe is to be nothing other than the first occupant of the non-dupe, in other words what I called the impetus (erre). But this impetus is our only chance of really fixing the knot in its existence, because it is only ek-sistence qua knot. It is what only ek-sists by being knotted in such a way that it can only be squeezed. Even in confusion! [On the board] What I have not been able to draw for you here is the Borromean knot; it is enough to have one of three. You know, you can very well draw it in a totally confused way, so that you won't hear a peep out of it!

http://www.lacaninireland.com

To say that there is no sexual relationship starts from the idea of a phusis, namely, from something that would make of sex a principle of harmony. Relationship, up to today means for us proportion. The idea that one could reproduce this with words, that words were designed to mean something, that if being is, the result is for example that non-being is not. Yes! There are still people for whom that means something. The Parmenides meaning there, like that, at the origin, has become chit-chat, and that it does not come into anyone's mind that this is not properly speaking a sign that it is only wind, flatus vocis! I am not saying at all that they are wrong, quite the contrary, they are precious to me, they prove that meaning goes as far in equivocation as one may desire for my theses, namely, for the analytic discourse. Namely, that starting from meaning there is enjoyed, s'oui-je, j'ouisse myself, souis-je m'assoter with words. Naturally, naturally, there is something better. Except for the fact that the better, as popular wisdom has it, is the enemy of the good. Just as surplus enjoying comes from the père-version, from the a-per-(e)-itive version of enjoying. We can do nothing about it. The speaking being aspires only to the good, as a result of which he plunges always into the worst. That does not mean that he cannot refuse it, huh! Not even me. Here, I am a grain like all of you, ground down in this salad. The trouble is, is that everyone knows that this has good effects…I am talking about analysis! That the good effects only last for a while does not stop it being a respite, and that it is better, make no mistake, than doing nothing. It is a little annoying all the same! It is an annoyance that one can try to go against, despite the current, is that (142) not so. Because it is, despite everything, of a nature to prove the ek-sistence of God himself. Everyone believes in him! I defy each one of you [to show] that I will not prove to him that he believes in the ek-sistence of God! This is even the scandal. The scandal that psychoanalysis alone highlights. It highlights it because at present it is only psychoanalysis that proves it. I am talking about proving it. It is not at all the same as proving to you that you believe in him. Formally, this is only due to Freud's Jewish tradition, which is a literal tradition that links it to science, and at the same time to the Real. This is the cape that must be rounded.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

God is Father, hyphen, towards, père-vers. This is a fact made obvious by the Jew himself. But we will indeed finish up by, in short I cannot say that I hope for it, I am saying it – by going against this current, we will finish up by inventing something less stereotyped than perversion. This is even the only reason why I am interested in psychoanalysis, I am saying that I am interested and why should I try to do what is currently called galvanising it. But I am not stupid enough to have the least hope of a result that nothing promises and which no doubt has been taken from the wrong end. This thanks to this unbelievable story of Sodom and Gomorrah, huh! There are even days, when it can come to me that Christian charity is on the path of a perversion that illuminates a little the non-relationship. You can see how far I am going, huh. It is nevertheless not to my inclination, but anyway, make no mistake, we must not exaggerate (charrier)…nor be charitable (chariter)! There is no chance that we have the key to the road accident which means that sex has ended up by being an illness in the speaking being, and the worst illness, huh! The one by which he is reproduced. It is obvious that it is to the advantage of biology to strive, to become with a slightly different emphasis, 'viology', the 'logy' of violence and to force itself to the side of mouldiness with which the aforesaid speaking being has many analogies. You never know, a lucky encounter! Someone like Francois Jacob is Jew enough to allow the non-relationship to be rectified, which in the present state of knowing can only mean replacing this fundamental disproportion of the aforesaid relationship by a different formula, by something that can only be conceived of as a detour that is destined to err (erre), but an error limited by a knot.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

Yeah! I would not like all the same to leave you without pointing out something to you, pointing out something which I think is opportune. I think that you have had a pile of little pages distributed, because I (143) have been told so by Michel Thomé and Pierre Soury? Yes! They are little pages that are very important because they demonstrate something, that there is only a single orientated Borromean knot.

There you are! So then, for them I want, like that, because probably they will be the only ones to appreciate it, to point out the following for them, which is that what I contributed today like that – I don't know what I contributed today moreover – what I contributed today, namely, the remark that there is a way of making a cycle with two circles, this remark has consequences as regards their proposal, that there is only one orientated knot. On the fact that there is only one orientated knot when there are three rings of string, but not when there are more, I agree. Nevertheless, there is something amusing, which is that if you transform one of these rings into an infinite straight line… – that was the import of the remark that I had made to them, but, against which they were right to hold out – I had made the remark to them that it was on the side of this third that there was something that seemed to me to require the ek-sistence, not of one knot, but of two orientated knots. It is to them that I am addressing myself for the moment is that not so, and because of that I am charging them to respond to me. I am addressing myself to them. I am not asking a question, I am not saying does it not appear to you? I affirm, I affirm that if there is one that is transformed into an infinite straight line, there is no longer simply one orientated knot, but two. I did not make the little drawing of it, but I am going to do so. I am going to do so on this last piece of paper that I explicitly left blank, and I am pointing out to them that the infinite straight line is not orientatable. From where could it be orientated? It is only orientatable, it is obvious, it is well known, starting from any chosen point whatsoever on this straight line from which orientations diverge. But diverging doesn't give it one. So then, with respect…you are going to see that I am going to do exactly what should not be done, namely,… Ah! all the same, I have managed it. Good. Namely, the following which is that by sticking to a simple formulation, let us point out that in the double circle [IX-9] there is an orientation, namely, what we will designate by the word gyre (gyrie).

http://www.lacaninireland.com

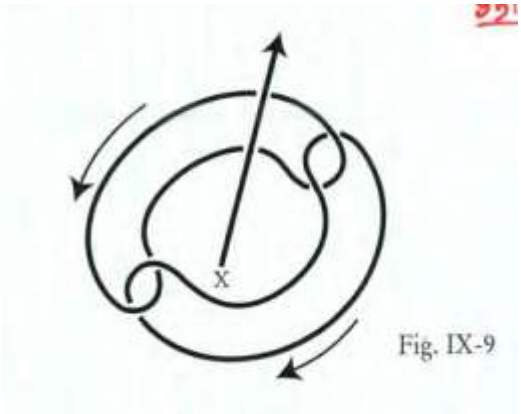

Fig. IX-9

http://www.lacaninireland.com

Not of course that we can say that it is dextro-gyratory or laevo-gyratory, everyone knows that now. For with all the time that people have been racking their brains to do so, it seems all the same, not that it is demonstrated, but that one could consider that, in short, there were enough clever people racking their brains, to do something about which it would be conceivable that we should send it as a message to someone who is supposed to be on another planet, and who would know the distinction between right and left. As regards that, we can admit it, as we have ended up by admitting it for the squaring of the circle, even though there it has been demonstrated, we can admit that nothing can be done. But to distinguish the gyres as being two, that we can do. We could do it with words in a message for the inhabitants of another planet.

[on the board] It is enough for them to have the notion of a horizon, which gives at the same time that of a plain. If we put just these two circles [IX-10] flattened out, this is what is supposed by the notion of horizon. We can say for example that we define one of them as being further from the point from which we will start on the straight line as a point of view, and that there is something external, which, as you see, because of the straight line highlighted by Soury and Thomé, concerning the knot of these two circles is, from a dextro-gyratory side, if we define dextro-gyratory by the fact that the most external one goes underneath, goes above the band of the circle, of the ring of string, and that there is another which, by this fact, also goes over, because this is how we define the gyre, but it is found to be in a different direction with regard to the circle. This circle [IX-9] has then two orientations, this one and that one, this one dextro-gyratory, that one laevo-gyratory; we are incapable of saying which is dextro, which is (145) laevo, we are incapable of transmitting it in a message. No manipulation of the knot of three – I tried it because I had hoped that the Borromean knot would perhaps give it to us – gives unambiguously the definition of laevo or of dextro. We always find ourselves confronted with the situation of having two gyres, but that to define them by the fact that the most external strip passes over the other strip, and that this is what ought to give the orientation, always fails. Since, as you see there, if we define the fact that the most external strip passes over the other, we find ourselves before an ambiguity, is it this one or that one? On the contrary, the ek-sistence of two gyres is made manifest by that. There are two gyres, two orientated Borromean knots, not just one, starting from the moment when we made an infinite straight line from one of the three, in so far as the infinite straight line is defined as non-orientatable. Namely, if you want it again, that we have the difference with what quite properly Soury and Thomé reasoned, namely, that there are three centrifugal, we are going to put a little e to say centrifugal, going towards the outside, there are there centripetal, three i's, there can be one i and two e's, one e and two i's.

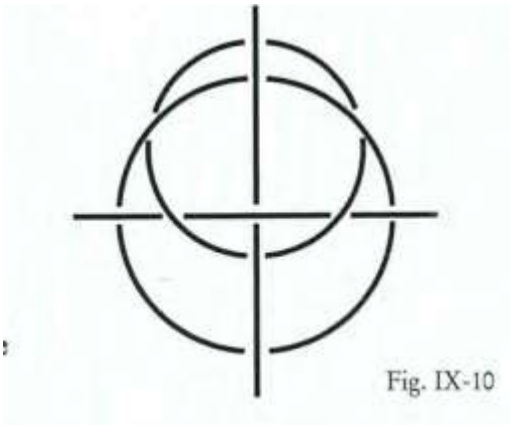

Fig. IX-10

http://www.lacaninireland.com

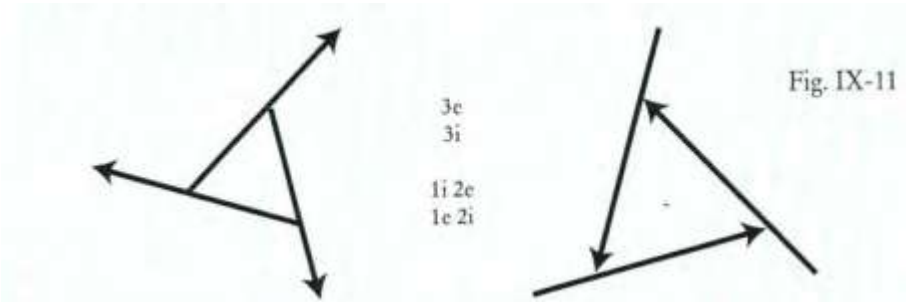

Fig. IX-11

These diverse specifications are those on which Soury and Thomé depend to demonstrate that there is only a single orientated knot.

If we have one straight line, one bar without orientation, we have then one-zero, one-i, one-e, and it is starting from that that there does not come a similar order, namely, that there is one-without-orientation,

http://www.lacaninireland.com

one-with-a centrifugal-direction, towards the outside, one-with-a-centripetal-direction, towards the inside.

1o 1i 1e

1o 1e 1i

(146) This is of interest, since for their demonstration, they started from the notion of the same, namely, that in all, reducing all the projections, all the flattening-outs that they made, they demonstrated that from these different flattening-outs there resulted the fact that it was the same, it was the same, as I might say, from all the flattened-out points of view. But it is sufficient that one, taken moreover from the knot point of view, should ek-sist, for it to demonstrate the orientations, namely, the Borromean knot qua orientated as being two. The knot is certainly not orientated, this from the fact that the three are so. If one of the three is not so, and it is sufficient for that that it should be coloured which means identical to itself, this makes it comprehensible that there are two of them. Once it is, either coloured or disorientated, what distinguishes it, there were already two provided one is specified. This remark consists in saying that a single coloured knot is sufficient, is sufficient by being equivalent to the fact that one of the knots is not orientated. The word orientatable which is in the dictionary of what was distributed to you is striking. The word orientatable already means that there are two orientations. The knot, certainly, can reabsorb these orientations among themselves, but it does not reabsorb them, once there is carried out on one of the elements of the knot this thing of distinguishing it by the fact that it is not orientatable, namely, that it is transformed into a straight line.

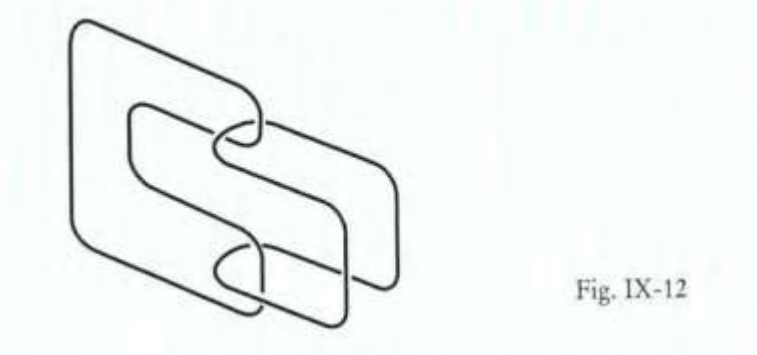

Fig. IX-12

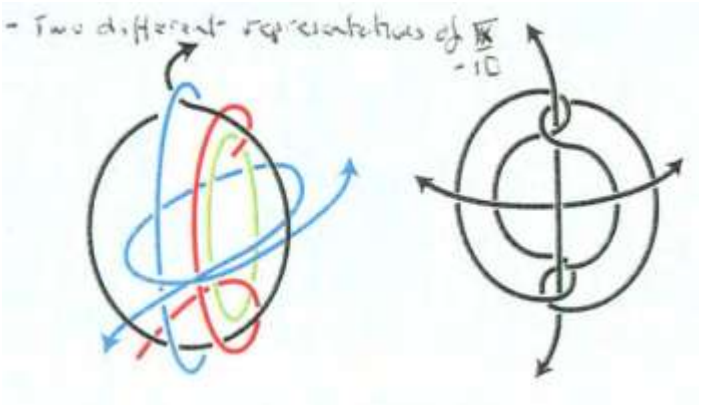
http://www.lacaninireland.com

I, do not propose, but I think I have sufficiently indicated what is involved in this knot as doubly orientated, and that it alone is what explains by the rapprochement that I made with the coloured one, that one of these knots should be by the fact of not being orientatable, by this very fact coloured, requires that there are two knots, and that is why the coloured one and the orientated one at the same time, makes (147) two. No doubt Thomé and Soury will think, no doubt it will come to them that the flattening-out here introduces a suspect element. Nevertheless, I point out the following to them, that the same articulations concerning orientation are valid, if we draw these two knots these two circles in the following way, that I believe, that perspective sufficiently indicates and that makes no reference to exteriority of one of the curves, of the one with respect to the curve of the other. There is neither external nor internal with the simple reference to these spatial way of saying, put into three dimensions, by representing the two circles, the circles that become cycles, already with this way, there is a way to demonstrate that there are two knots, and not a single one orientated, two Borromean knots of three orientated.

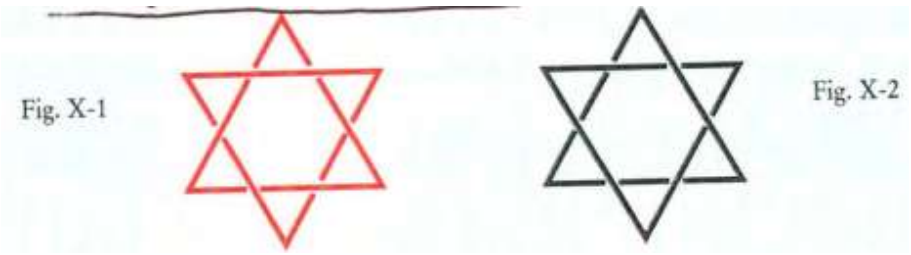
There you are, I will stick with that for today.



http://www.lacaninireland.com

Seminar 10: Tuesday 15 April 1975

Just like that, I imagined this morning, as I awoke, two little drawings, the two on top [on the board], on the extreme right. I imagined then two little nondescript drawings – you were able to see the difficulty I had in simply reproducing them. It is a matter in these two drawings: [X-1 and 2] those on top, of two triangles, and in addition, two triangles of the most ordinary type, in short, they do not even have curved sides; two triangles that cross over one another.



There is all the same, I think that it will be tangible for you who look at that, as I fabricated it, that there are in twos, those of the left, the red, that is why I put the others in black, which are knotted in a chain, which make just by those two, a chain, which are by this fact, comparable in every way to what I will talk about later, two toruses, one of which would pass through the hole of the other. The two others are not knotted. They can be pulled apart from one another. It (150) is like a torus that would be flattened out to operate, not at all to be knotted, but to operate in the hole of the other.

The case is the same, that is also why I put them in black, for these two triangles that are drawn underneath, except for the fact that one of these triangles is in sum bent around what is presented as – but of course that means nothing at this level – one of the sides of the other, I am saying side because people imagine that a triangle has three sides.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

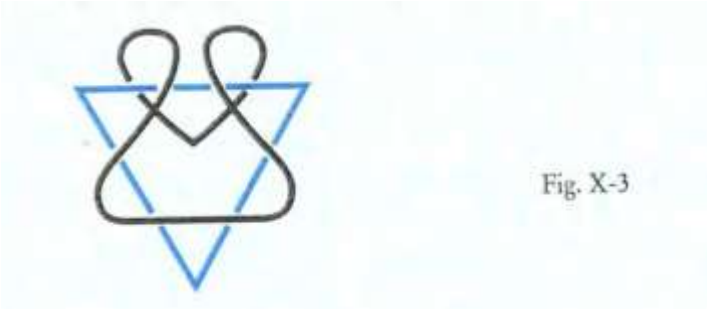


Fig. X-3

It is simply to get you into the swing of a geometry, to put you into the dimensions of a geometry that is repugnant for the word geometry; not without reason, because it is not a geometry, it is radically distinct from it. A topology is what, at the start, indicates how what is not knotted two by two can nevertheless make a knot.

We call a Borromean knot what is constituted in such a way that by subtracting one of these elements that I depicted, I say depicted, because it is only a figure, it is not its consistency, for each one of these couples of two that I made, it is enough to break – what is meant by break we will try to say later – that it is enough to break one of these elements in order that all the others should be also unknotted from each of them; and this can be done for as great a number of them as one wishes to state. You know that there is no limit to this stating. It is in that that it seems to me that there can be supported in a sayable (dicible) way, a term that I will comment on later, it is in it that there can be supported the term of sexual non-relationship, sexual in so far, I can only repeat, as it is supported essentially by a non-relationship of the couple. Does the knot as a chain suffice to represent the couple relationship?

(151) At a time when most of you were not at my seminar, since it was a time when I brought out what was involved in demand and desire, I illustrated with two toruses the link to be made between demand and desire, two toruses, namely, two orientatable cycles. I am going all the same to make the two toruses for you or at least to indicate them to you. It is something that begins to be drawn like that.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

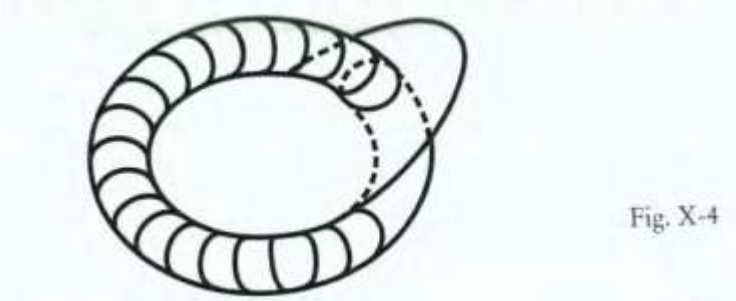

Fig. X-4

[On the board] You see, what is more, one gets entangled in it. Obviously, I am not very gifted, but you are no more so than I. Here's how this is drawn, if you want to make something complete. Since I put a wrong line there, I am going to indicate that there is on this torus, this particular torus, something which on its circuit comes to enter into the hole of the other torus. It is by depicting in each one of these toruses something that turns around that I showed what winds around this one, is shifted onto the other by a series of windings around the central hole of the torus. What does that mean if not that demand and desire, for their part, are knotted. They are knotted in the measure that a torus represents a cycle and is therefore orientatable.

You know, because all the same you have heard talk of that, of what constitutes the difference between the sexes, that this is situated at the level of the cell and especially at the level of the cellular nucleus or in the chromosomes which, since they are microscopic, seem to guarantee for us a defined level of the Real. But why the devil should people want what is microscopic to be more real that what is macroscopic! Something usually differentiates the sex which in each species is situated as male from that which is female, the fact is that in one case, there is a homozygotism, namely, a certain gene which is paired with another gene, without one ever knowing in advance how (152) in each species it is divided up, I mean, whether it is the male or the female that is homozygotic. The difference to the other sex, is that in the other sex, there is a heterozygotism somewhere, namely, that there are two genes which are not paired, pair meaning that they are h-o-m-o, homozygotic, that they are similar.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

It is an opportunity to give its whole weight to what André Gide makes great play of in Paludes, namely, the famous proverb Numero deus [sic] impare gaudet, which he translates by, the number two rejoices at being odd, as I said a long time ago; he is quite right, because nothing would produce this two, if there was not an odd. This odd in so far as it begins at the number three - which, of course, is not immediately seen - and which makes it necessary to display openly more developed knots, specifically what I call the Borromean knot.

With the Borromean knot, what we have within our reach is something that for us is essential, crucial, for our practice and we have no need of a microscope for there to appear the reason, the reason for what I stated as a first truth, namely, that love is h-a-i-n-a-m-o-r-a-t-i-o-n, hainamoration. Why love is not the velle bonum alicui, as St Augustine states, if the word bonum has the slightest support, namely, if it means wellbeing? Not that certainly on occasion love is not preoccupied a little bit, the minimum, with the wellbeing of the other, but it is clear that it only does so up to a certain limit, and I have found nothing better, up to now, than the Borromean knot to represent this limit. To represent it, you should clearly understand that it is not a matter of a figure, of a representation, it is a matter of positing that it is the Real that is at stake, that this limit is only conceivable in the terms of ek-sistence, which for me, in my vocabulary, my own nomination, means the interplay, the interplay permitted to one of the cycles, to one of the consistencies, permitted by the Borromean knot. Starting from this limit, love persists (s'obstine) because there is something of the Real in the affair, love persists, quite contrary to the wellbeing of the other. This indeed is why I called it hainamoration, with the substantified vocabulary of the writing with which I support it.

This notion of limit implies then an oscillation, a yes or a no, it is to wish the good of someone or to wish strictly the contrary, it is all the same something which suggests to us the idea of a sinusoid. So then,

http://www.lacaninireland.com

(153) what is this sinusoid like? If there is a limit, it is a circle. The sinusoid is like this [X-5].

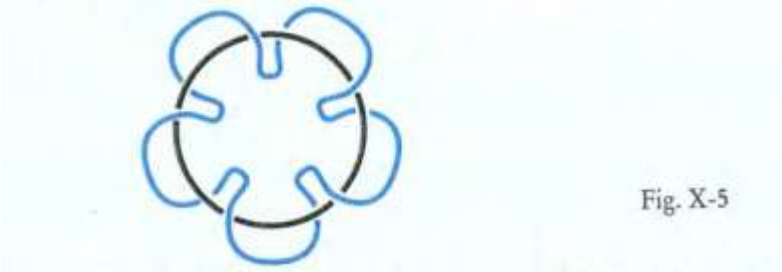

Fig. X-5

Does this sinusoid wind around? Does it make a knot or not by being wound around or not? This is the question that is posed by the notion of consistency, more nodal, as I might say than that of line, since the knot underlies it. There is no consistency that is not supported by the knot. That is why from the knot the very idea of the Real is dictated. The Real is characterised by being knotted. But still this knot must be made.

The notion of the unconscious is supported by the fact that not only is this knot found to be already made, but it is found made in a different emphasis of the term 'One is made (on est fait!)'. One is made by this act X by which the knot is already made. To my mind there is no other possible definition of the unconscious. The unconscious is the Real, I am measuring my terms. If I say it is the Real in so far as it is holed, I advance. I advance a little more than I have the right to, because I am not the only one who says it, who still says it, soon everyone will repeat it and, by being rained on, it will finish up by becoming a very pretty fossil. But meanwhile it's new! But up to the present, I am the only one who has said that there was no sexual relationship, and that this made a hole at a point of being, of the speaking being. The speaking being is not very widespread, huh! But all the same, it is like mould, it has a tendency to expand. So then, will we content ourselves with saying that the unconscious is the Real in so far as it is afflicted…- You're leaving, you're quite right. How can people put up with what I am telling them! – that the unconscious is the Real, in so far as in the speaking being, it is afflicted by the only thing that makes a hole, which assures us of the hole. This is what I called the Symbolic, by incarnating it in the signifier, of which when all is said and done there is no other definition than that, the hole. The signifier makes a hole.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

(154) That is why I am putting forward, I already said it, the knot is not a model. Not alone is what makes the knot not Imaginary, not a representation, but its characteristic is precisely the following, that is why it escapes from being represented, and that I assure you that it is not to make grimaces, that every time I represent one, I put in a wrong line; since I believe I am no less imaginative than anybody else, this demonstrates already the point to which the knot is repugnant to us as a model. There is no affinity between the body and the knot, even if in the body, it plays a damned important function for analysts. The knot is not the model, it is the support. It is not reality, it is the Real. That means that if there is a distinction between the Real and reality, it is the knot, not which gives a model of it, until of course finally, fossilisation arrives, you pass your time making knots between your fingers. It is desirable. That will suggest to you a little more ingenuity.

In bringing back the unconscious to the Symbolic, namely, to what makes a hole from the signifier, I am doing something, my God, that will be judged by its effect, its fruitfulness. This seems to me to be dictated by our very practice, which is far from being able to be content with an obscure reference to instinct, as people persist in translating the word Trieb into English. Instinct at its emergence and which, of course, is immemorial, and how even know what it meant, before Fabre, who only supports it from one thing, how the devil can a little insect know, because we affirm this knowledge from the precision of its gestures, how it must at a particular point of the body of another insect, at a particular joint, and what is more since it is a matter of an insect slipping underneath what is called the carapace and which, of course, is only a figurative mythology because there must be somewhere something to pierce, to reach what, a particular precise point of what we know now comes from the ectoderm, namely, the invaginated part that is called the nervous system and there, breaks something which means that the other insect can be preserved.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

What is this knowledge? What interest has it? How is it explicatory to transport it into a behaviour which is like the one that we see in the human being, every day, and who obviously has no instinctual knowledge, who does not see any further than the tip of his nose, but who, for his part also, from a different source, finds himself able to do a lot of things. And specifically, in short, knowing how to make, it is a way of putting it, to say that he knows how to make love is probably (155) very exaggerated. This pushes all the same this idea that I stated, of course, because I for my part take risks like that, that pushes this idea that, the one that I came to, like that in little steps, that the Real is not all (tout) and when I say that it is not all, that puts a lot of things in question. At the same time it implies that science, well, only extracts little bits of this Real. That it extracts manifestly up to the present with the idea of the universe, which it seems is indispensable for it but why? So that it can manage to assure, to make sure. Obviously it manages to make some things sure, when there is number, and that is truly what it is all about. How does it happen that language conveys a certain number of numbers so that one finally arrives at qualifying as real number properly ungraspable numbers, that are not otherwise defined, namely, that they are not in the series, that they even cannot be in it, that they are fundamentally excluded from it. How these numbers one, two, three, four came to peoples' minds says a lot about the subject of knowledge. For my part, I took like that a certain side, pushed by what? I will not say by my experience because an experience only means one thing, namely, that one engages in it, and I do not see why my engagement would be preferable. If I were the only one for example anything I might say would have no import. It is indeed because there is something that I am trying to situate, in the form, in the species of psychoanalytic discourse, namely, that I am not alone in carrying out this experiment, that thanks to the fact that I am like everybody else, I am a speaking being. That thanks to this fact I am led to formulate what can account for this analytic discourse, in a certain way. Good!

http://www.lacaninireland.com

There is someone who – this was reported to me – like that, he is a complete bastard; he said that, I do not know, that my theory was dead! It is not as dead as all that, it will indeed end up by becoming so, is that not so, with the crusting over that I spoke about earlier. Meanwhile, this guy who obviously is not of my persuasion, he is one of these guys who talk…who talk like that…they talk…they don't know what they are saying, who talk about psychical reality! Yes! I would not call anything whatsoever by such a name, because the psyche, precisely is what everyone has tried to avoid, it gives rise to incredible difficulties, it involves a world of suppositions, it supposes (156) everything, it supposes God in any case. Where would the soul be if there were no God, and if, what's more, God had not explicitly created us to have one! This cannot be eliminated from any psychology.

What I am doing, at least what I am trying to do, is to talk about an operational reality. Naturally it is much more limited, but that requires, it seems to me, from the fact that the simple word, the blah-blah…the blah-blah of the bastard I mentioned just now, who says that my theory is dead, in short, he literally does not know what he is saying, it means that he is only talking, he is blathering, and I am sure, that in his analysis that works. That works with a certain limitation, of course, but I am sure that it works, otherwise, he would not continue to be an analyst. Even the word of those who believe in psychical reality works. Yes! Despite you, for you, and this is what, I don't know, I would like a little bit to make you grasp, that for you, for you if simply you experience things a little, the structure of the world (monde), if I can express myself thus, to talk about what is filthy (immonde), the structure of the world, I would ask you to try to grasp the points, the points where you can grasp that for you the structure of the world consists in putting you off with fine words. And that this is even why the world is more futile, I mean that flees, it is more futile than the Real, this Real that I am trying to suggest to you, in its dit-mansion, the dwelling of the said, that I try to get you to grasp by this said of mine, namely, through my saying.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

The fuss that is being made about this psychoanalytic business is crazy, and it is badly read. There are very serious people, there are very serious people, who busy themselves with the dreams of animals. They cannot of course, there is no way of knowing whether the animal dreams, I beg your pardon, they cannot of course know whether the animal dreams, but really they know that it has all the appearances of it, is that not so, of the dream. The animal sleeps and then, it is obvious that if he stirs, it is because something is going through him, and since of course, naturally, no one doubts that ideas are images, nothing more, that is even what it means; what is marvellous, is that language is always there as a witness. So then there are images, so he has ideas, which does not mean that he names them. So then, there are guys like that who get excited around the idea that the dream is not there, as Freud said, to protect sleep. The trouble is that Freud did not (157) say that. Sleep in itself can only designate qua sleep what is called a need, the need to sleep. What Freud says, is that the dream in the speaking being…because he did not experiment on rats, nor on anything else like that of which we have the proof that it dreams, no one knows whether a fly dreams, nor a rat, one can imagine it because we are all a bit of a rat from some angle, and in particular we are failures (raté)! And the experiments in question are such more than the others, they are ratified, they are Ratmen. In short when one is a man one is inhabited by a lot of Ratmen. In any case we have men who are at the level (au ras) of science. Freud said that the dream protects, not the need, but the desire to sleep. It is quite certain that this dit-mansion alone adds to this Real like that, this insignificant Real in short, that is supposed to be scientific, where people imagine needs. But on the contrary, if there is one thing that Freud really made us sense, and there we should follow the text, and notice that for his part, he knows what he is saying, which is that the dream protects something that is called a desire. Now a desire is not conceivable without my Borromean knot.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

This is simply in short a remark by which I am trying to show that my saying is all the same, for its part, orientated, and to say that what I am saying is only conditioned by the fact that – I would not say that the word acts in the analytic discourse – that only the word acts. Im anfang war die Tat as someone or other has said, and he believes that he invented something there! Yes in short, it's not too bad, he thinks that it contradicts das Wort, but if there is not dat Wort before the die Tat, well then, there is no Tat at all. While analysis grasps a point, very limited of course, a very limited point where the word has a Wirklichkeit. Of course, it does what it can, it perhaps cannot do a lot, but in short it is all the same a fact, a fact that is all the more exemplary, that this gives us the hope of having a little light on something which is manifest, that there is no action that is not rooted – I will not even say in the word, in the wawah in das Wort, das Wort is that, it is to go ouah-ouah. Only the unconscious allows it to be seen how there is a knowledge, not in the Real, [but as a support of the Symbolic]. It is already a lot that it should be supported by this Symbolic that I tried to get you to sense as conceivable, not at the limit, but by the limit, as being made up of the consistency required for the hole, and by this fact requiring it. The Symbolic, certainly, (158) goes round in circles, and it only consists in the hole that it makes. So then everything that has been said about instinct, only means that we had to go towards the Real, towards the supposed Real, that one goes to the Real in order to have a presentiment of the unconscious. And in the sense that the body means consistency, the unconscious gives body to this instinct in a practice. If we want body to mean consistency there is only the unconscious to give body to instinct.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

Yes! Of course, why would all this not be a vain debate between specialists, huh! But in short, this supports a saying, a saying which could have consequences, if analysts said something other than tittle-tattle, it's a fact that they say nothing. Have you ever seen something come out of the Institut psychanalytique de Paris, for example? Something readable? It's funny all the same, yeah, you will tell me that there is my School. Of course my School, I have just had an experience, like that, in the Journées which have even, that's what's marvellous, what is tiredness! Nevertheless I was very happy, I was completely in my element. Everybody said things that proved that I had been read and I could not get over it. Not only which proved that I had been read, but even , faith, that people were able to bring out of it, like that, pseudopodiums which proved that my saying was being extended. Even I mean to the extent of drawing a certain number of consequences and which were no small thing. You must not imagine that because I question them here that they do not react. They react for reasons which stem from the function of saying, which stem from ek-sistence, namely, from the knot, when all is said and done. But it existed bloody well in these Journées. I, naturally have a tendency to think that what I am saying, namely, this discourse founded on a hole, the only hole that is certain, the hole constituted by the Symbolic, because there is one thing whose demonstration, everything on the board is designed to demonstrate it, a hole provided it is consistent, that is circumscribed, a hole is sufficient to knot together a strictly indefinite number of consistencies. And this begins with two as is manifest by this Borromean knot here [IX-2]; that it begins with two guarantees it. That is why the two is only supported by the fundamental hole of the knot. A striking thing, the four [X-6], namely, how it happens that a hole, this one for example, is sufficient (159) to knot together three consistencies that you can make recto-linear – for it is clear that here I can reduce this buckle to be parallel to the one that is here, which on this occasion I designated by a small b.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

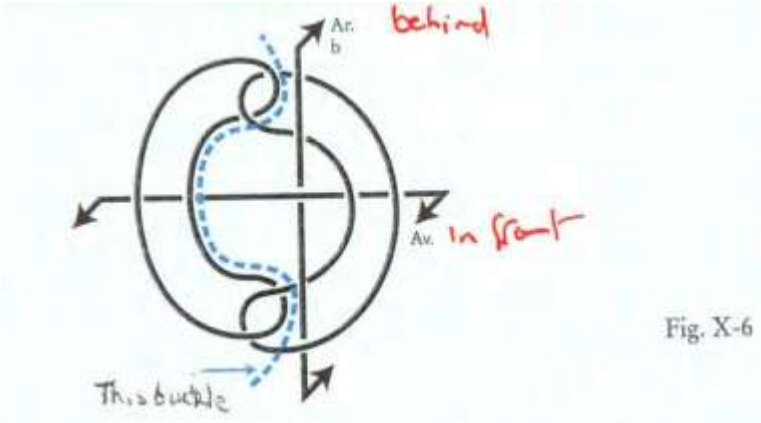

Fig. X-6

Why would I give a hole, a hole circumscribed by a consistency this privilege, this privilege of highlighting the first time that the fact that the hole makes a knot is not limited to two. The fact is that the couple, all by itself, is always unknottable, unless it is knotted by the Symbolic.

I had put that forward as I could at one time, I was recently reminded, in what is called my Rome Discourse, the one for which finally I am delaying a repetition of, I spoke about the full word. Obviously, it was not bad, even though what the words were worth does not amount to much namely, as I told the person who was talking to me about it, the full word, if indeed it supports what creates a knot in the you are my wife, I all the same showed a little bit, because I said it since, of course, I did not say it right away like that because I had Lagache and Favez-Boutonnier on my back. In short, anyway, you can imagine if I had said tuer ma femme huh, like that, yeah! To kill her, yes, good. That would have made a bad impression (mauvais effet), and I am all the same…I look twice at it, I do not lack all common sense, I look twice at it before creating a bad impression. Someone asked me recently in the name of what did the Jury d'Accueil (Reception Committee) proceeded in order to stretch its benevolent hand over a certain number of people in the School. It is simply that, they will not (160) make a bad impression, they will not make a bad impression right away - they will do so later when they have got older, and have won a little authority.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

Good, well, the couple, of course, was knotable, whatever may have been the full words that founded it. What analysis demonstrates, is that not so, what it demonstrates in a quite tangible way, is that it is knotted despite that. It is knotted by what, huh? By the hole. By the prohibition of incest. Yes, there are not many people who have highlighted that. It must all the same be said, in the Jewish religion, there was a thing all the same that I wanted to tell you like that, in passing – why do the Jews not get a good press huh? Well, I am going to put that in your pocket, it corrects a certain number of things. It is because they are not nice/gentiles (gentils). If they were gentiles, well, they would not be Jews would they? That would settle everything! It is the prohibition of incest. There are all the same people who managed to make that emerge in myths, and even, the Hindus are after all really the only ones who said that if one has slept with one's mother you had to go away, I don't know whether it is towards the East or towards the West, I think it is towards the West, towards the West with one's own prick between one's teeth, after having cut it off of course!

Yeah! We will not consider the fact of the prohibition of incest as historical. It is of course historical, but one has to look so much in history that, as you see, I ended up by finding it among the Hindus, and one can say that here one gets hold of one end of it, huh! It is not historical, it is structural. Why is it structural? Because there is the Symbolic. What one must manage to clearly conceive of is that this prohibition consists in the hole of the Symbolic. There must be something of the Symbolic for there to appear individualised in the knot this something that I, I do not so much call the Oedipus complex, it is not so complex as all that. I call that the Name of the Father. Which means nothing but the Father as Name, which means nothing at the start, not simply the father as name, but the father as naming. There, one cannot say that in this regard the Jews are not nice huh! They really did explain to us what the Father was, the Father that they call, the Father that they stick into a point of the hole that one cannot even imagine, I am what I am, that is a hole, no! Well! It is from (161) there, that by an inverse movement, for a hole, if you can believe my little schemas, the hole whirls around, or rather it gulps down, huh, then there are moments when it spits out again. It spits out what? The Name. It is the Father as Name.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

Obviously one must have all the same a little idea of what that involves, namely, that the prohibition of incest, is propagated. It is propagated on the side of castration, like the other gentiles, in short here the Greeks showed us all the same in a certain number of myths, namely, where they made a genealogy uniquely founded on the Father. Uranus, Chronus, and so on and so forth, until the moment when Zeus after having made a lot of love, faints, faints before what, before a breath. There is all the same a further step to be taken otherwise we comprehend nothing about the link of this castration with the prohibition of incest. It is to see that the link is what I call the sexual non-relationship.

When I say the Name-of-the-Father, that means that there can be like in the Borromean knot an indefinite number of them. That is the core point. It is that this indefinite number in so far as they are knotted everything rests on one. On one, qua hole it communicates its consistency to all the others, hence the fact that, you understand, the year when I wanted to speak about the Names-of-the-Father, I would all the same have spoken about a few more than two or three, huh! And what upset that would have caused among analysts, if they had had in short, a whole series of Names-of-the-Father! You can well imagine that I could not have stated an indefinite number of them. A little bit more than the two or three that I had prepared, I am quite satisfied all the same to let them high and dry, namely, to have never taken up these Names-of-the-Father, except, like last year, in the form of the Non-dupes, the Nons-dupes-qui-z'errent. Obviously, they cannot but err because the more of them there are, the more they will become entangled, and I am certainly very happy to have not brought out a single one.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

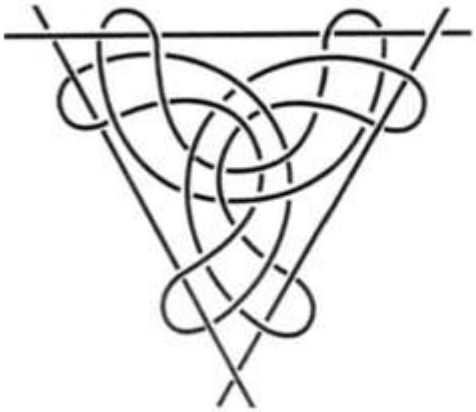

Fig. X-7

But, this indeed is why I found myself at the end of these Journées having to answer for something that naturally no one had paid attention to in the School, namely, as to what constituted what is called a cartel. Why a cartel? This is the question that I asked, and – to which miraculously I obtained indicative responses, pseudopodiums as I said earlier, things that made a little bit of a knot, is that not so! (162) Why did I posit very precisely that a cartel starts from three plus-one person, which in principle makes four and gave as a maximum this five, thanks to which that gives six. Does that mean that I think that like the Borromean knot, there are three that must incarnate the Symbolic, the Imaginary and the Real. After all the question could be put, I might be crazy! Have you heard tell, I asked the question yesterday, at the Journées because I wanted above all to receive, to instruct myself, have you heard tell of identification? Identification in Freud is quite simply inspired. What I want is what? The identification to the group. Because it is certain that human beings identify to a group. When they do not identify to a group, they're finished and should be locked up. But I am not saying by this to what point of the group they must be identified. The start of any social knot is constituted, I am saying, by the sexual non-relationship as a hole, not of two, at least three, and what I mean, is that even if you are only three, that will give four. The plus-one person will be there, even if you are only three, as is very precisely shown by this schema here [IX-7], this giving the example of the fact that this will make a Borromean knot [X-7] if one started from the idea of the cycle, as it is made from two knotted [X-6] even if you were only three, that will make four, hence my expression plus-one. And it is by withdrawing a real one that the group will be unknotted. For this you must be able to withdraw a real one to give the proof that the knot is Borromean and that it is indeed the three minimal consistencies that constitute it. In the three, one never knows which of the three is real, (163) and that indeed is why there must be four, because the four is what in this double buckle [IX-7] supports the Symbolic by what in effect it is made up of, namely, the Name-of-the-Father. Nomination is the only thing about which we can be sure that it makes a hole. And that is why in the cartel I gave this number four as giving the minimum, not without considering that one can all the same have a little bit of slack about what ek-sists and perhaps one day, why not next year, at the rate I am persisting, I will try all the same to show you what all the same the Names-of-the-father…if I couple this Name-of-the-Father to the Symbolic, to make of it the plus-one, by which there is manifestly assured…while here [On the board, IX-2], with three there is something that is not seen right away in the fact that neither a nor b cross over the hole and make a chain. When there are two of them [IX-6] one sees that even with one it does not cross any of the two holes, that the hole is between the two. That indeed is why the couple does not exist. But perhaps we can specify that there is only after all the Symbolic which has the privilege of the Names-of-the-father, that it is not obligatory that it should be to the hole in the Symbolic that nomination should be joined. I will indicate it next year.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

But to come back from this, because I want to end on something which has substance, did not Freud state properly that in identification, he said, nobody sees its support, namely, its import. There is no love except from the identification brought to bear on this fourth term, namely, the Name-of-the-Father. Is it not strange that he only states three identifications for us, and that in this three there is everything you need to read my Borromean knot. Namely, that he goes as far as to designate properly consistency as such, in so far as in this knot, it is everywhere. Whether it makes a hole or not, consistency is the basis namely, you see, the triskel, namely, this [X-7] for example because I only have the example of it there, the triskel which is not a knot. It is only inscribed from consistency, he called that the unary trait, one could not say better! Which is a component of the knot, not without having got the idea that there is only love, I would say, because of the fact that the Name-of-the-Father makes a buckle between the three, makes a buckle of the three of the triskel. This term triskel, I think that it perhaps means something to a certain number of you. It is strictly that, in so far as extended you see what in (164) it? Three batons (fusils) which make a bundle, that support one another in 3's, this is what as you know perhaps, and this is where the name comes from, the Bretons took up to make up their coat of arms, the coat of arms of modern Brittany.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

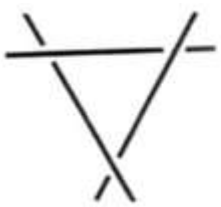

Fig. X-8

That gets us away from the cross, there is already that in short. Yeah! Apart from the fact that one can say that the cross of Lorraine, in its way if it is drawn in the correct way also makes a triskel. And what did Freud add to it? He added minimal identification to it in order that this term of identification is supported with respect to the Borromean knot.

I repeat for you, precisely, [On the board] that it is in so far as the Name-of-the-Father is what makes a knot here, and it is a matter of the

http://www.lacaninireland.com

triskel, the Name- of-the-Father, here, makes a knot of the triskel, it is in so far then as the triskel ek-sists that there can be identification, identification to what? To that which in the Borromean knot, I remind you, in every Borromean knot, I remind you…There, you see, here is my triskel here in every Borromean knot it constitutes the heart, the centre of the knot. And where did I mark for you that already desire was situated, the desire which is also a possibility of identification? It is here, namely, there, where I situated for you the place of the o-object as being the one that dominates what Freud makes the third possibility of identification, the desire of the hysteric.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

Seminar 11: Tuesday 13 May 1975

There are no, there are no moods (états d'âme). This has to be said, to be demonstrated. And to promote the title under which this saying will be pursued next year, if I survive, I would announce it as: 4, 5, 6.

This year I said R.S.I. Why not 1, 2, 3? – "Un, deux, trois, nous irons aux bois (1, 2, 3 we will go to the wood) – you know the rest perhaps? - "Q*uatre, cinq, six, cueillir des cerises*, (4, 5, 6 to pick cherries)" – Yes – "Sept, huit, neuf, dans mon panier neuf, (7, 8, 9 in my new basket). – Well, I will stop at 4, 5, 6. Why?

Why are R.S.I given as letters? That they are three can be said to be secondary. It is not because they are three that there is one which is the Real. Which, which of these three letters would deserve this title of Real? I say that at the level of logic, what matter! And that meaning yields it to number to the point that it is number that, am I going to say, dominates this meaning? Not at all! Determines it. The number three is to be demonstrated as what it is if it is the Real, namely, the Impossible. It is the most difficult sort of demonstration. What one wants to demonstrate does without saying, it must be impossible, a condition required for the Real. It ek-sists as impossible.

Again it must be demonstrated, not simply shown! Demonstrating refers to the Symbolic. If the Symbolic is thus a step ahead of the Imaginary, that is not enough, it only gives the tone. And when all is said and done, it is not tone that one must trust but number. This is what I am trying to put to the test. But is a knotted number still a number? Or indeed is it something else?

(166) That is where we have got to. I have kept you throughout this year around a certain number of news flashes. For my part, I am not all that important in it, being determined as subject by the unconscious, or indeed by the practice, a practice that implies the unconscious as presupposed. Does that mean, that like every sub-posed, it is imaginary? It is the very meaning of the word subject, sup-posed as imaginary.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

What is there in the Symbolic that is not imagined? What I want to tell you is that there is the hole. Someone who saw me preyed on, make no mistake, by this knot, that here [XI-1] I am drawing for you in its simplest form, someone who saw me preyed on by it, in more complicated forms, told me that I was contradicting myself in a way by having put forward at one time, in terms that are not even my own, which are from Picasso as everyone knows, 'I do not seek, I find', someone said to me: 'Well then there, I see you really searching.'

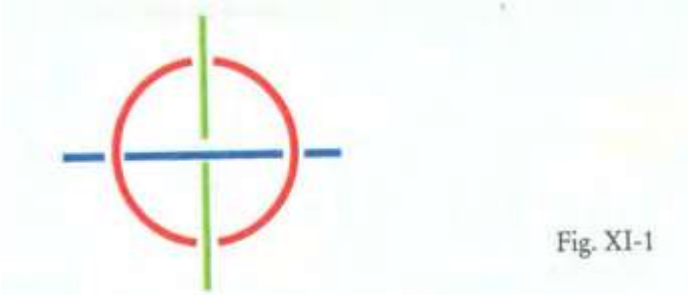

Fig. XI-1

To search (chercher), is a term that comes from circare, as you can find in any etymological dictionary. I find all the same, because that not in the etymological dictionary, I found the hole, Soury's hole, if I dare to express myself in this way, through which I am reduced to pass. Does it have to do with what people imagine determines it, namely, the circle? A circle may be a hole, but it is not always so… While I am at it, at this subject, I would say – I recall what can already be found in the last lines of my Remarks on psychical causality – an Arabic proverb which states that there are a certain number of things, he also names three of them, on which nothing leaves a trace, the man in the woman, he says first, indeed the step of the gazelle on a rock. I anticipated it, recalling the third term of this ending with a comma, 'more inaccessible to our eyes, this trace, made for the signs of the

http://www.lacaninireland.com

(167) moneychanger.' That is the third term. There is no trace on the coin that has been touched, only wear.

Yes! It is indeed here that there comes to be settled, make no mistake, this knotted thing that is at stake, I find, enough to have to foment the circle which is only the consequence of the hole, I find, enough to be able to move around (circuler). I do not know if you have noticed that the police whom Hegel posits very well are at the root of everything political and that there is nothing in politics that is not, when everything has been boiled down, purely and simply police, that policemen have only one word to say: keep moving (Circulez!). The gyre that I spoke to you about the last time does not matter to them, whether it is gyring to the right or to the left, they don't give a damn, make no mistake, what is at stake is to keep moving! That becomes, that only becomes serious if one starts from the hole through which one must pass. What is remarkable in the knot called 'bo', I am not saying beautiful (beau), in the beau knot, as I will call it on this occasion, is exactly the fact that it forms a knot, while not moving around in a way that uses the hole as such. There is a difference between this knot and that one [XI-2] that the hole uses. This is what makes a chain.

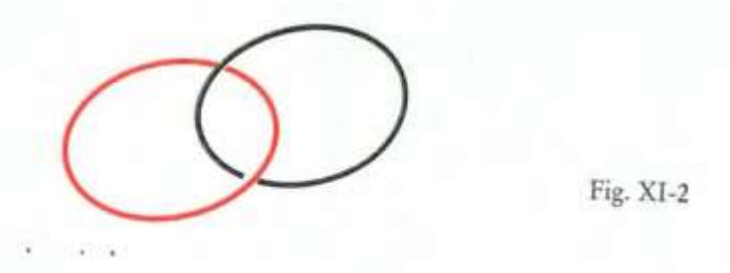

Fig. XI-2

It is striking ever since chains have been made that the thing that has not been noted, is that in the 'bo' knot, there is no need to use the hole because it makes a knot without making a chain. How does it make a knot? In such a way that, to redo it in the way the rings do [XI-3] which is exactly the same thing as that [XI-4], despite the appearance as you see it in this form, this form of pure appearance, it is in the measure that these two rings are not knotted [XI-4] that the third, in this very measure, bends one of the two, that are free among themselves, bends it in such a way that necessarily when it gets to the other end of one of these circles, it will bend the other in its turn, and thus, it will turn around, if this ring, the small one there, we suppose it to be the Symbolic, it will indefinitely make a circuit of the – in inverted commas since it is not a true chain – of the 'false chain' of the Imaginary and the Symbolic. This indeed is what is at stake.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

Fig. XI-3

How recognise oneself in this coupled double circle and precisely, by not being knotted? In order for a knot to be Borromean, for a knot to be 'bo', it is not enough that it should be a knot, it is necessary that each of the elements, this term it is necessary and it is sufficient, is not given its full meaning unless it is referred to the knot; to say it is necessary, is something, but to say it is sufficient implies, which is always forgotten because people do not make the hole (trou), the only hole that is worthwhile, the discovery (trouvaille)! Because one does not make the hole, one does not see that if the condition is lacking, nothing is going to work out! Which is the opposite of the 'it is necessary', the always eluded opposite. I am going to show it to you right away.

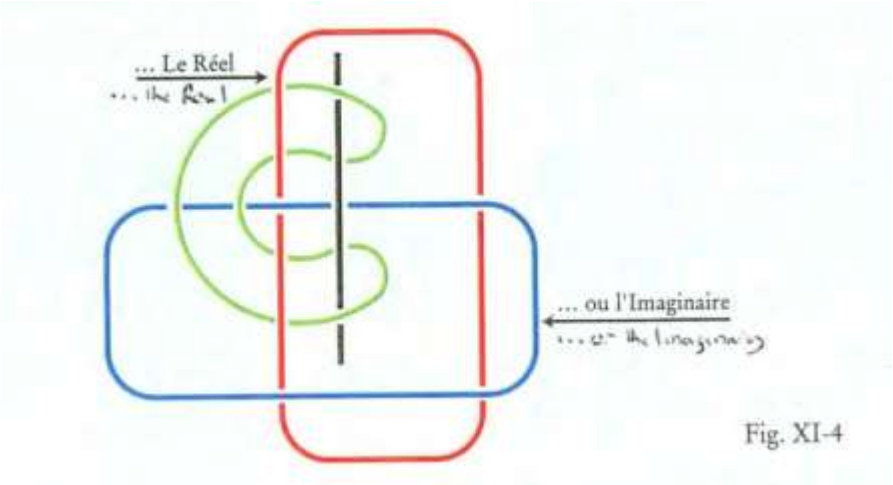

Fig. XI-4

http://www.lacaninireland.com

You knot two circles [XI-5] you knot them in a way which implies, since here it is not demonstrated but simply shown, you knot them in

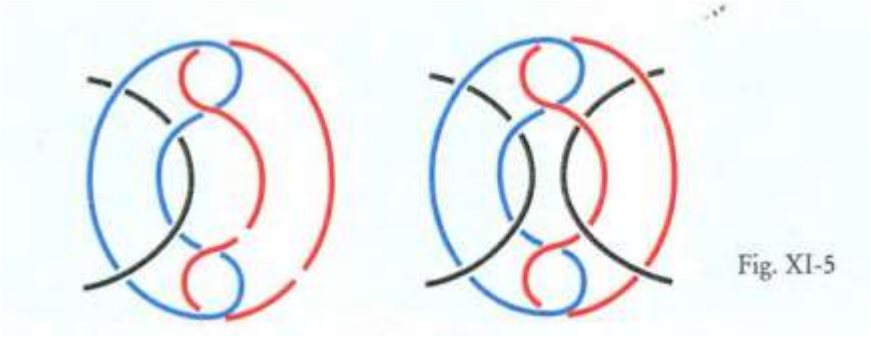

Fig. XI-5

(169) such a way that they are not knotted; that they make here something which is just as much the consistency of a circle as an infinite straight line. This is sufficient because it is identifiable to this figure [XI-1], the 'bo' knot. This is enough to make a Borromean knot. Nothing is going to be easier for you to imagine than the fact that if you make another one pass here like that, you have a figure which will have the air – how can you not believe it? – of being a

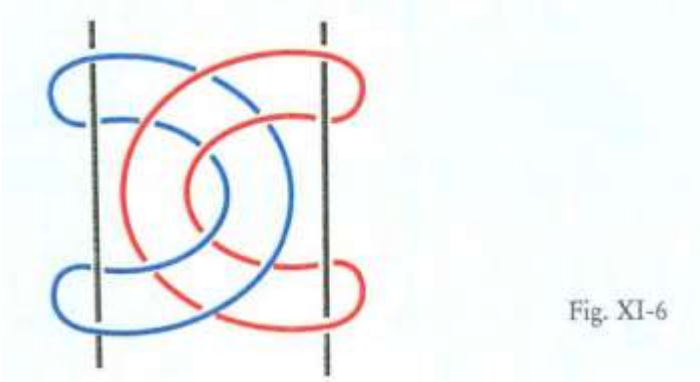

Fig. XI-6

Borromean knot. Nevertheless it is not sufficient to cut this consistency for each of the three elements to be free from the two others. For it to be thus, it would be necessary that things should be differently arranged, which nevertheless indeed seems to be the same thing, namely, [XI-6] that the arrangement in four elements should be in this form, qua showable. What demonstrates it? For in this form, it is clear that any one of the elements being broken, the three others are free, which was not the case in the first figure that I gave you.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

(170) And first of all what is there in common in the way in which I depicted these four elements for you, what is there in common between the straight line as infinite and the circle. What is in common is that their breaking liberates the other elements of the knot. The breaking of the circle is equivalent to the breaking of the infinite straight line. How? From the point of view of the knot – not in so far as the breaking in its effects on the knot, not in its effects as a remainder on the element. What does there remain of the circle after its breaking? A finite straight line as such, you may as well say ready to be thrown out, a little rag, a piece of cord that is good for nothing. The zero of the cut circle! Allow me to depict this cut up by what separates it, namely, the two, zero over two equals, at the very most, this little one worth nothing at all. The infinite straight line, the big One, once it is sectioned, gives all the same two half-straight-lines that start as they say, from a point, from a zero point, in order to go to infinity. One over two equals two. This in order to make you sense that when I state that there is no sexual relationship, I give to the meaning of the word relationship the idea of proportion. But everyone knows that the mos geometricum of Euclid, which sufficed for so long to appear the paragon of logic, is quite insufficient and to get into the figure of the knot. There is a completely different way of supporting the figure of the non-relationship of the sexes, it is to support them by two circles qua not knotted. That is what is at stake in what I state about non-relationship, each of these circles which are constituted we do not yet know of what, in the relationship of the sexes, each one in its way of turning around as sex, is that not so, is not knotted to the other. This is what my non-relationship means.

It is quite striking that language has for a long time anticipated the figure of the knot, about which mathematicians have begun to spar only in our own day, to call a knot what unites the man and a woman, without naturally knowing what is at stake, in speaking metaphorically about the knots that unite them. It is these knots that it would no doubt be worth referring to in showing that they imply as necessary this elementary 3 by which as it happens I support them by this three indications of meaning, of materialised meaning, that are depicted in the nominations of the Symbolic the Imaginary and the Real.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

I have just introduced the term nomination. I had to answer for it recently in connection with what was collected in a little work by logicians on the subject of what the logicians have managed to state (171) up to now, concerning what is called the referent. I fell there from the heights of my knot, and this did not facilitate things for me at all because that is the whole question: does nominations stem, as it apparently seems, from the Symbolic? You know, in short, perhaps you remember it! I made for you one day the figure that is required when one wishes to foment a knot of four. The least that can be said is that if we introduce nomination at this level, it is a fourth element. This figure, I made it for you in this way [XI-7]: one must start from the unknotted circles, and I even have no repugnance in evoking the case where I was found lacking with regard to this figure. Here is what is appropriate for a fourth circle to knot the three that first of all were posited as unknotted. This figure, contrary to the one in which one day I was just as entangled as you may be on occasion, for want of having disciplined yourself to this exercise, one of these circles remained outside the operation.

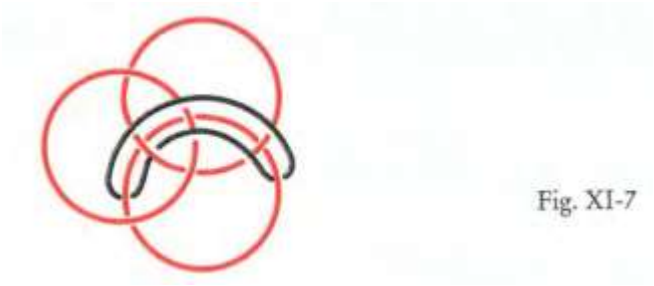

Fig. XI-7

It is in this that however full in its simplicity the Borromean knot of three may be, it is starting from four, and I underline, by being engaged in this four, that one finds a path, a particular path that only goes up to six. In other words, which makes of the coupled circle,

http://www.lacaninireland.com

taken for each one of the elements qualifiable from the fact that the three is dictated, not from distinction, but quite the contrary from the identity between the three terms of the Symbolic, the Imaginary and the Real to the point that it seems to us to be required to find in each one, this triplicity, this trinity of the Symbolic, the Imaginary and the Real. Namely, to recall that the Real holds up in these terms that I already fomented with the name of ek-sistence, of consistency and of hole, to make of ek-sistence written as I write it, namely, what operates up to a certain limit in the knot, this supports the Real. What gives consistency is of the Imaginary order which is supposed by the (172) fact that it is truly tangible for us that if there is something from which the rupture springs, it is indeed consistency, to give it its most restricted meaning. There remains then – but does there remain – for the Symbolic the affectation of the term hole, this in so far as mathematics, the one properly qualified as topology, gives us a figure in the form of the torus of something that can depict the hole. Now topology does nothing of the kind, if only because the torus has two holes, the internal hole with its gyre and the hole that one can call external, thanks to which the torus is demonstrated as participating in the figure of the cylinder which is one of the ways which best materialises for us the figure of the straight line at infinity. Everyone knows the relationship of the straight line at infinity to what I simply call the ring of consistency. Everyone knows this relationship, and not simply for having seen me depict it in the Borromean knot, the one that carries the indication o.k. (n.bo.).

Someone named Desargues, the Arguésien, as they say, noticed a long time ago that the infinite straight line is in every way homologous to the circle. In this he anticipated Riemann, he anticipated him. Nevertheless a question remains open to which I already give an answer by the attention that I am bringing to bear on the Borromean knot. Which will not prevent you, at least I hope, from maintaining present to your minds a form of question.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

[At the board] As you see in this figure on the left [XI-1] of the Borromean knot constituted by the equivalent of this circle in the form of a straight line knotted to a circle, of the couple [XI-4] supposed by what here, to give your mind a support, could be the Symbolic. The two others, without us knowing what straight line should in particular depict the Real, for example this one, or the Imaginary for that one, what is required for that to make a knot? The point at infinity must be such that the two straight lines do not make a chain. Here is the condition that the two straight lines, whatever they may be, from wherever one sees them – I am pointing out to you in passing that this from wherever one sees them supports this reality that I state about the look, this look is only definable from wherever one sees them from – where one sees them from is in truth, if we think of a straight line as going round a point, a unique point at infinity, how not see that the fact that they are not knotted has a meaning. Not alone does it have a meaning that they are not knotted, but that it is by not being knotted that they will effectively be knotted at infinity, a point that to the best of my knowledge Desargues, Desargues whom I used at the time that (173) somewhere other than here, at Normale Supérieure, to evoke it by its name, I was giving my seminar on Las Meninas, the Las Meninas of Velasquez that I took advantage of to pride myself on situating where was this famous look which quite clearly is the subject of the painting. I situated it somewhere, in the same interval – perhaps one day you will see this seminar appearing – in the same interval that I am establishing here on the board, in a different form, namely, in the one that I define from the fact that the infinite straight lines at their supposed point at infinity, are not knotted in a chain.

Here indeed is where the question begins for us. It does not seem that Desargues ever asked himself about the form in which he supposed these infinite straight lines, in posing the question of whether they knotted or not. It is quite striking that Riemann, for his part, should have settled the question in a way that gives little satisfaction by making of all the points at infinity, whatever straight line they belong to, a single and unique point which is at the principle of Riemann's geometry.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

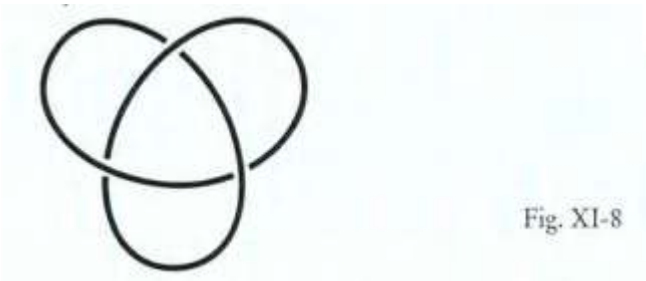

Fig. XI-8

By raising the question of the knot, we are going to see, I am going to depict something for you here [XI-8], ah!, that I hope to get to the end of, in the form of a knot, a true one, which, a curious thing, presents a sort of analogy with this form [XI-3]. If we study this knot as the mathematicians do, what we, all that we can do, is to initiate the notion described as that of the fundamental group, namely, define the structure of this knot by a series of journeys (trajets) that will be made from any point whatsoever, this one, for example. We define the knot by something called the fundamental group which involves a number that differs according to the knots, a number of journeys that are necessary to indicate its structure. These journeys, even if they make several buckles in each one, but here I am asking the question, I am putting the hole in quotation marks, in each one of the holes which, apparently, make this knot, will be a certain number of them, and (174) contrary to what you may imagine, this number, in this case, in this case where the flattened-out figure seems to involve four, four distinct fields, that will not make for all that four individualised circles of the journey, but contrary to what one may imagine, this is not the number which will be characteristic of this fundamental group, it will be the relation between a certain number of journeys.

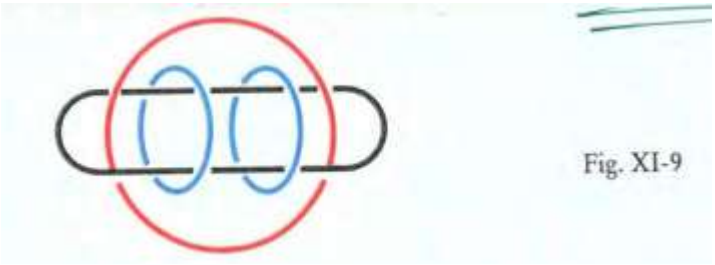

Fig. XI-9

http://www.lacaninireland.com

We are supporting here, in a pure state, the notion of relationship, in so far as, precisely, it brings us back to the knot, to the Borromean knot, since this very relationship makes a knot, except for the fact that the knot lacks numbers. In taking this stage of the Borromean knot, we support by the very number the circles or the journeys that are at stake for any knot whatsoever, even if this knot, the one that I have just drawn, as you see, only has a unique consistency. We take the number as a go-between, as an intermediary, as itself an element to introduce us into the dialectic of the knot. What I will come to this time is the following, it is that namely, nothing is less, as I might say, natural than to think this knot. That there is something of the one, which I put forward at one time to support it by the circle is something to which, precisely, the movement of thought is limited, to make a circle, and that is why there is nothing more natural, make no mistake, than to reproach its circle as vicious. That if, to depict the relationship of the sexes without otherwise specifying any more, I find the figure of two one (sic), in the form of two circles, that a third knots precisely by the fact that they are not knotted with one another, for what is at stake is not simply that they are not so, that they are free when this third is broken, it is that this third, as I showed you in the figure [XI-9], this one, what is at stake is that it is because this third explicitly knots them by the fact that they are not knotted and if all I had done was to get this function into your heads, I would consider that today I (175) had not spoken in vain. This is the very thing that is at stake, it is from the fact that they are not knotted that they knot. And the necessity of a fourth term should come here to dictate its first truths is precisely what I want end on. Namely, that without the fourth, nothing is properly speaking highlighted – I was not able to do it today – highlighted about what the Borromean knot truly is.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

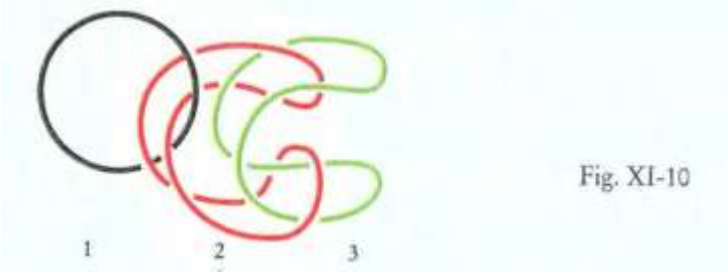

Fig. XI-10

In any chain, to imagine the simplest one for you, in every Borromean chain, there is a one then a two [XI-10] according to the form that I drew for you earlier, you will find here the one and the two, which is the beginning of the chain after which, here, there will be a third circle that act as a buckle. What is implied by the fact that in any chain whatsoever, since it makes a chain, it always makes a chain, we place any one whatsoever of the first two in the third rank? Whatever may be the chain, the operation that is at stake will imply for us limiting the chain 1-2-3-4, [XI-11] will imply that if we wish to put any one whatsoever of these two in the third rank, the one will be then knotted to the two, both by the three and the four. Try it out, for moreover there is nothing like it to try to think out this knot than to manipulate

(176) rings of string. I repeat, although already having no more space on the board, 1-2-3-4, [XI-12] to limit ourselves to that, in any chain whatsoever, from whatever end we take it, will imply that by putting either the 1, or the 2 in the place described as the third, by making the effort, we will obtain the following. The fact is that by choosing one of the two, since here it is the 2 that we choose, to put the 2 here in the third row, the 3 and the 4 will necessarily knot this 1 to the 2 that is shifted in this way. It is quite clear that the 1 and the 2 are interchangeable, namely, that at the start of a chain, the first and the second are indefinitely interchangeable [XI-13]. It is by placing the one of these two there in the third rank, by striving to aim at placing it in row three that we will see not simply the three involved and passing to the place of the 2, but with the 3, the fourth. And this is why the interest that I have in the knot of four is justified on this occasion and that I will develop it next year.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

Fig. XI-13

From then on, since we do not know what to couple nomination with, the nomination which here constitutes the fourth term, are we going to couple it to the Imaginary, namely, that coming from the Symbolic, nomination is there to have a certain effect in the Imaginary? This indeed in effect is what seems to be at stake among logicians when they talk about the referent. The descriptions of Russell, those that question themselves about the author, those that ask why it is legitimate and logically fragile to question the fact of whether or not (177) Walter Scott is the author of Waverley, it seems that this reference explicitly concerns what is individualised by the thought-out support of bodies. It is certainly in fact nothing of the kind. The notion of referent aims at the Real. It is as Real, that what the logicians imagine as Real, gives its support to the referent. For this imaginary nomination, the one that is written by this for example, that from the relation between R and S, we have a nomination index i, and then the I to stick with the knot of four, as constituting the link between the Real and the Symbolic.

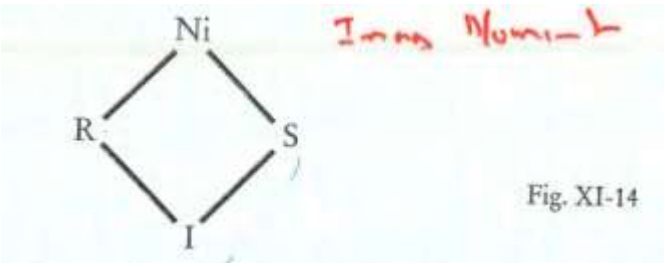

Fig. XI-14

I would propose the following, which is that Imaginary nomination is very precisely what I have supported today by the infinite straight line,

http://www.lacaninireland.com

and that this straight line, in this circle that we compose of a circle and a straight line, that this straight line is very precisely not what names anything whatsoever of the Imaginary but what, precisely, creates a bar, inhibits the handling of everything that is demonstrative, of everything that, articulated as Symbolic, creates a bar at the level of the Imagination itself and renders what is at stake in the body as regards which everyone knows that what interests the body, at least in the analytic perspective, is the body in so far as it creates an orifice, that that by which it is knotted to some Symbolic or Real that is involved, is precisely from this knot, the highlighting of a circle, of an orifice that the Imaginary is constituted.

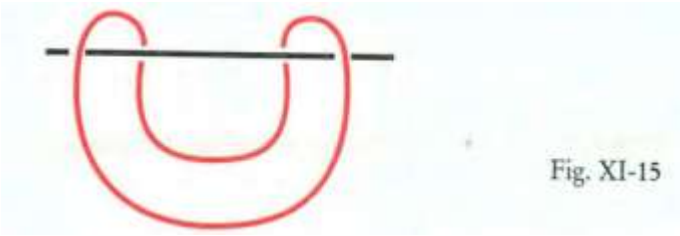

Fig. XI-15

(178) This infinite straight line which here completes the false hole [XI-15] that is at stake, since an orifice is not enough to make a hole, each one of them being independent of the other, is very precisely the inhibition that thought has with respect to the knot. We can question in the same way, whether between the Real and the Imaginary, it is the nomination index of the Symbolic, namely, in so far as in the Symbolic there arises something that names, we see that at the beginning of the Bible, except for the fact that what is not noticed is that the creationist idea, the inaugural Fiat lux, is not a nomination. That it is from the Symbolic that the Real arises – that is the idea of creation – has nothing to do with the fact that in a second phase, the same God gives their name to each of the animals that inhabit Paradise.

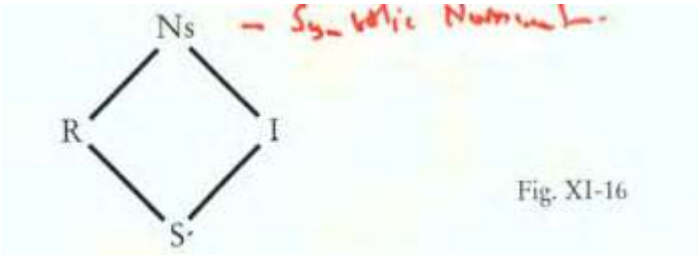

Fig. XI-16

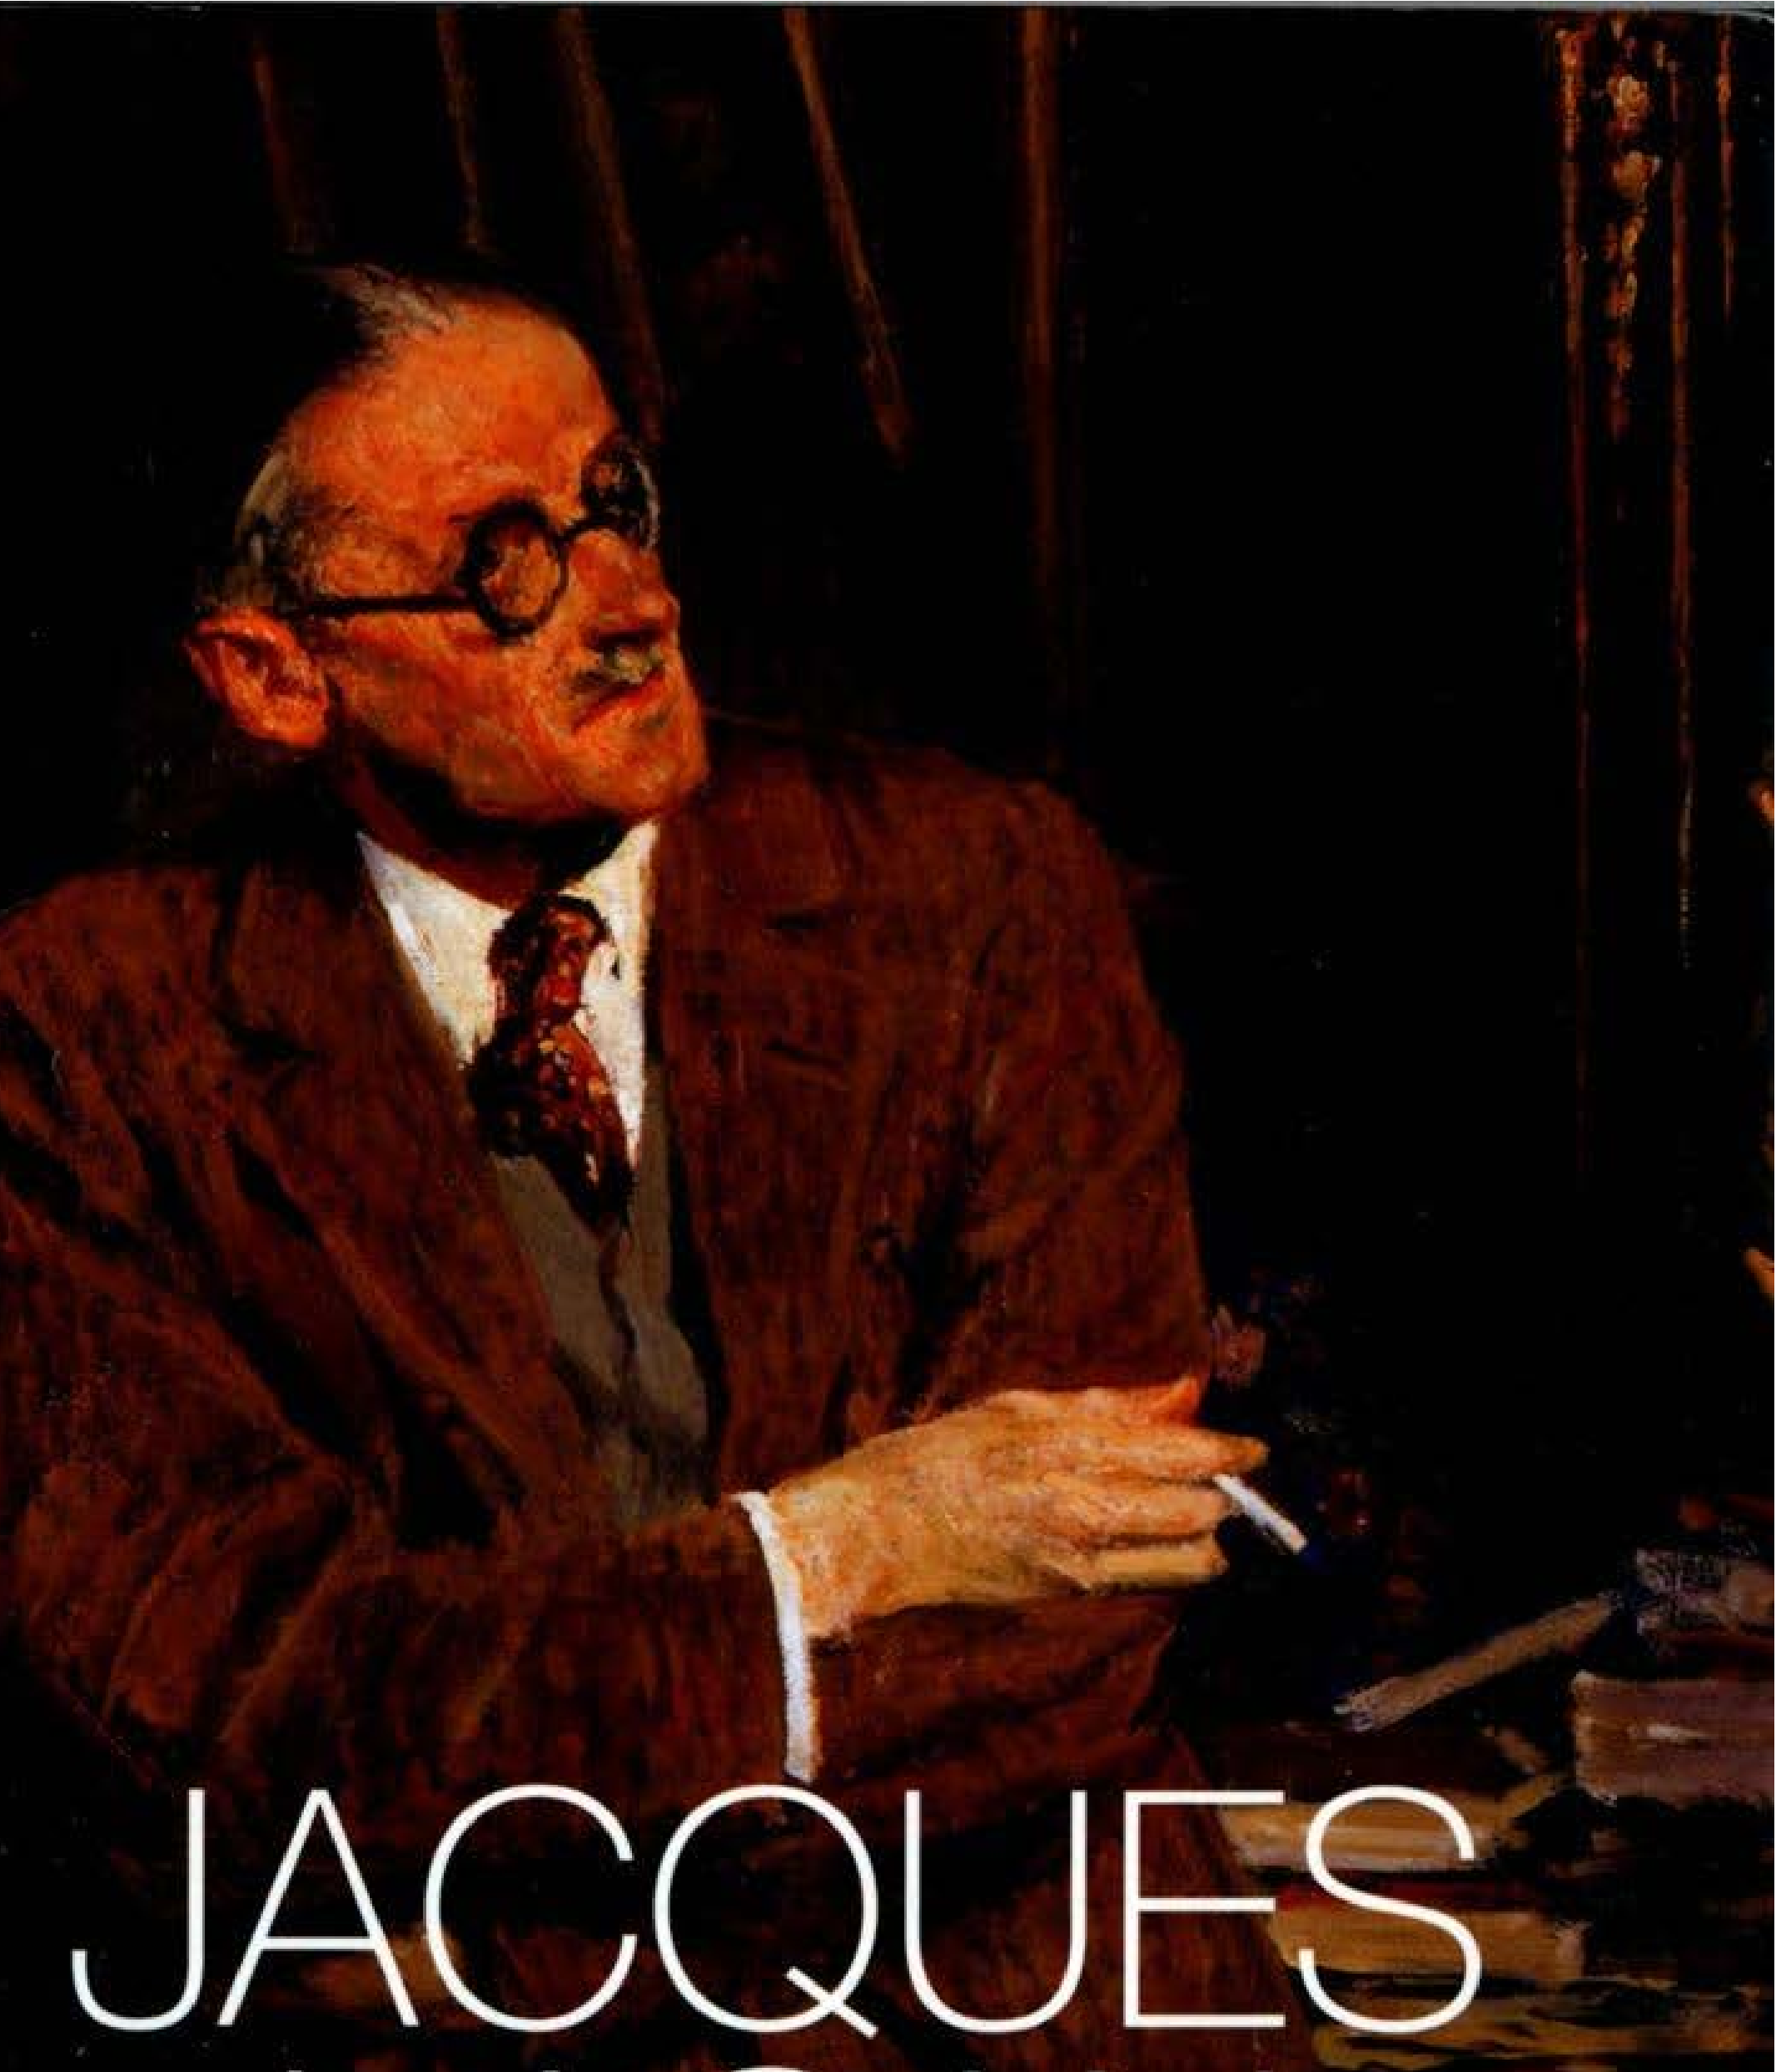
http://www.lacaninireland.com

What nomination is at stake, in what I am calling here to indicate it by a Ns, what nomination is involved, in this, in one of the two of those we are mythically told about? This indeed in effect is a question that is worth dwelling on a little, because this stems from the meaning which, in each case, is a different meaning. The nomination of each one, which moreover is a common name, not a proper name in Russell's sense, what does the nomination of each one of the species represent? Assuredly a narrowly Symbolic nomination, a nomination limited to the Symbolic. Is this sufficient for us to support what happens at a point that is certainly not indifferent in this elementing of four of the knot that is supported by the name of the Father. Is the Father the one who has given their name to things? Or indeed should this Father be questioned qua Father, at the level of the Real? In a word is the eternal Father, in whom of course nothing would prevent us from believing if it was even thinkable that he himself believes in himself, while it is quite clearly unthinkable, should we put the term (179) nomination as knotted at the level of this circle by which we support the function of the Real? It is between these three terms, nomination from the Imaginary as inhibition, nomination from the Real as what is found to happen in fact, namely, anxiety, or nomination from the Symbolic, I mean implicated, flower of the Symbolic itself, namely, as it happens in fact in the form of the symptom, it is between these three terms that I will try next year, it is not a reason because I have the answer that I do not leave it to you as a question, that I will question myself next year about what substance should be given to the name of father.

http://www.lacaninireland.com



JACQUES LACAN

The Sinthome

The Seminar of Jacques Lacan | Book XXIII

Edited by Jacques-Alain Miller

'Ten times, an elderly grey-haired man gets up on the stage. Ten times puffing and sighing. Ten times slowly tracing out strange multi-coloured arabesques that interweave, curling with the meanders of his speech, by turns fluid and uneasy. A whole crowd looks on, transfixed by this enigma-made-man, absorbing the ipse dixit and anticipating some illumination that is taking its time to appear.

Non lucet. It's shady in here, and the Théodores go hunting for their matches. Still, they say, cuicumque in sua arte perito credendum est, whosoever is expert in his art is to be lent credence. At what point is a person mad? The master himself poses the question.

That was back in the day. Those were the mysteries of Paris forty years hence. A Dante clasping Virgil's hand to be led through the circles of the Inferno, Lacan took the hand of James Joyce, the unreadable Irishman, and, in the wake of this slender Commander of the Faithless, made with heavy and faltering step onto the incandescent zone where symptomatic women and ravaging men burn and writhe.

An equivocal troupe was in the struggling audience: his son-in-law; a dishevelled writer, young and just as unreadable back then; two dialoguing mathematicians; and a professor from Lyon vouching for the seriousness of the whole affair. A discreet Pasiphaë was being put to work backstage.

Smirk then, my good fellows! Be my guest. Make fun of it all! That's what our comic illusion is for. That way, you shall know nothing of what is happening right before your very eyes: the most carefully considered, the most lucid, and the most intrepid calling into question of the art that Freud invented, better known under its pseudonym: psychoanalysis.'

Jacques-Alain Miller

CNL Centre national du livre

polity

www.politybooks.com

ISBN 978-1-5095-1000-9

9 781509 510009

The Sinthome

Jacques Lacan

The Sinthome

The Seminar of Jacques Lacan
Book XXIII

Edited by Jacques-Alain Miller

Translated by A. R. Price

polity

First published in French as Le Séminaire. Livre XXIII. Le Sinthome (1975–1976), © Éditions du Seuil, 2005

This English edition © Polity Press, 2016

Polity Press
65 Bridge Street
Cambridge CB2 1UR, UK

Polity Press
350 Main Street
Malden, MA 02148, USA

All rights reserved. Except for the quotation of short passages for the purpose of criticism and review, no part of this publication may be reproduced, stored in a retrieval system, or transmitted, in any form or by any means, electronic, mechanical, photocopying, recording or otherwise, without the prior permission of the publisher.

ISBN-13: 978-1-5095-1000-9

A catalogue record for this book is available from the British Library.

Library of Congress Cataloging-in-Publication Data

Names: Lacan, Jacques, 1901–1981, author.
Title: The sinthome : the seminar of Jacques Lacan, book XXIII / Jacques Lacan.
Other titles: Sinthome. English
Description: Cambridge, UK ; Malden, MA : Polity Press, [2016] | "First published in [French] as Le Séminaire. Livre XXIII. Le Sinthome." | Includes bibliographical references and index.
Identifiers: LCCN 2015050858| ISBN 9781509510009 (hardcover : alk. paper) | ISBN 1509510001 (hardcover : alk. paper)
Subjects: LCSH: Psychoanalysis. | Joyce, James, 1882-1941--Criticism and interpretation.
Classification: LCC BF173 .L1462213 2016 | DDC 150.19/5--dc23 LC record available at http://lccn.loc.gov/2015050858

Typeset in 10.5 on 12 pt Times NR MT by Servis Filmsetting Ltd, Stockport, Cheshire Printed and bound in the UK by CPI Group (UK) Ltd, Croydon

The publisher has used its best endeavours to ensure that the URLs for external websites referred to in this book are correct and active at the time of going to press. However, the publisher has no responsibility for the websites and can make no guarantee that a site will remain live or that the content is or will remain appropriate.

Every effort has been made to trace all copyright holders, but if any have been inadvertently overlooked the publisher will be pleased to include any necessary credits in any subsequent reprint or edition.

For further information on Polity, visit our website: www.politybooks.com

Contents

THE SPIRIT OF THE KNOTS

I. On the Logical Use of the Sinthome, or Freud with Joyce 3
II. On What Makes a Hole in the Real 17
III. On the Knot as the Subject's Support 33

THE JOYCE TRAIL

IV. Joyce and the Fox Riddle 47
V. Was Joyce Mad? 62
VI. Joyce and Imposed Words 74

THE INVENTION OF THE REAL

VII. On a Fallace that Vouches for the Real 87
VIII. On Sens, Sex and the Real 100
IX. From the Unconscious to the Real 110

BY WAY OF CONCLUSION

X. The Writing of the Ego 123

Note 137

APPENDICES

Joyce the Symptom, by Jacques Lacan 141
Presentation at Lacan's Seminar, by Jacques Aubert 149
Reading Notes, by Jacques Aubert 166
A Note Threaded Stitch by Stitch, by Jacques-Alain Miller 176

Notes 222
Index 232

Book XXIII

The Sinthome

1975–1976

THE SPIRIT OF THE KNOTS

I

ON THE LOGICAL USE OF THE SINTHOME OR FREUD WITH JOYCE

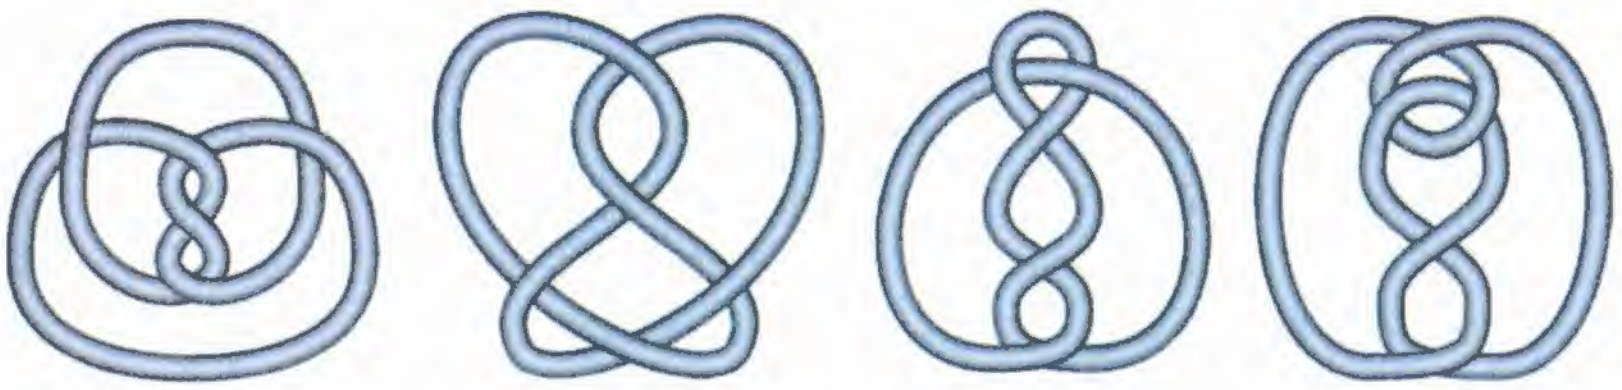
Joyce, that father-tasked wretch
The body: form and the fact of saying
The father is a sinthome
On the four-component Borromean link
On an art that foils the truth of the sinthome



Figures drawn on the blackboard[1]

Sinthome is an old way of spelling what was subsequently spelt symptôme.

This way of spelling it marks a date, that of the injection of Greek into what I call my lalingua, specifically French.[2] Indeed, I've allowed myself to alter its spelling in this way because Joyce, in the first chapter of Ulysses, expressed his wish to Hellenize, to inject in like fashion the Hellenic tongue, but into what? We don't know, since it wasn't Gaelic, even though Ireland was involved.

Joyce had to write in English, there's no doubt about that. However, as someone whom I do hope is here in the audience, Philippe Sollers, has remarked in Tel Quel, Joyce wrote in English in such a way that the English language no longer exists.

Admittedly, this tongue was already one that bore little consistency, which doesn't mean that it's easy to write in English, but, through the sequence of works that he penned in English, Joyce added something to it that makes the same author say that it ought to be written l'élangues.[3] I suppose he thereby means to designate something like the elation that we are told lies at the root of a sort of sinthome that in psychiatry we call mania.

Mania is indeed what Joyce's last work looks like, the one that he strung out for such a long while to attract the attention of all and sundry, namely Finnegans Wake.

It was in relation to this work that I let myself get roped into opening a Joyce symposium, given what I must say was a pressing request from Jacques Aubert, who is present here today and every bit as pressing. This was also how, all told, I let myself be turned away from the project I announced at the end of the last academic year, which was to call this year's Seminar 4, 5, 6. I've made do with four, and I'm glad because I would surely have been defeated by 4, 5, 6.

This doesn't mean that the four at issue shall sit any more lightly on my shoulders.

1

I have inherited from Freud, quite in spite of myself, for having stated in my time what could be gleaned with sound logic from the gibberish of those he called his band, and whom I've no need to name. This was the clique that attended the Vienna meetings, and it can't be said that a single one of them followed the path of what I'm calling sound logic.

To cut to the chase, I shall say that what specifies Nature per se is that it is not a nature, hence logical process as a means of broaching it. Through the process of calling Nature that which you exclude by the very fact of taking an interest in something, this something becoming differentiated on account of being named, Nature ventures nothing save to affirm itself as a potpourri of what is not in the nature of anything.

This statement has one advantage, which is the following. Should you find, fairly reckoning, that naming stands apart from what seems to be the law of Nature, that man doesn't enjoy any relation that is naturally sexual – this naturally comes with every reservation – well, this statement allows you logically to posit that this is not exclusive to man, which does actually turn out to be the case.

Take care, however, not to start saying that there is nothing natural about sex. Try instead to find out how it is in each case, from bacteria to birds, because they do have names. I've already alluded to both one and the other.

Let's note in passing that in the Creation that is said to be Divine only in that it makes reference to naming, the bacterium is not named. Nor is it named when, fooling around with the putative original man, God suggests he begin by the act of saying the name of each little beastie.

The only trace we have of this first bout of mucking around lies in concluding from it that Adam, as his name indicates well enough – an allusion to Peirce's function of the index – was a Madam, precisely in keeping with the joke that Joyce makes.

Indeed, one does have to assume that Adam only ever named the beasts in the tongue of she that I shall call l'Ève. I've every right to call her this because in Hebrew, if Hebrew is indeed a tongue, her name means mother of the living.[4] Well, l'Ève found her tongue straightaway, and kept it well-oiled, because after the putative naming by Adam she was the first person to put it to use, in order to speak to the serpent.

This so-called Divine Creation is thus redoubled by the parley of the parlêtre, as I've called him, by which l'Ève turns the serpent into what you'll allow me to call the serre-fesses, the buttock-clencher, later designated as a faille, a fault-line, or better still, a phallus – because you need one to make the faut-pas.[5]

This is the fault, the sin, which my sinthome advantageously starts with. In English, sin refers to the trespass of original sin, hence the necessity of the fact that the fault-line that is always growing doesn't stop, unless it should undergo the stop of castration as possible.

I said in the past that this possible is what stops being written. Seeing you here in such large numbers I reckon there must all the same be some who have already heard my yarns, but you haven't remotely noticed, since I myself didn't, that a comma has to be included here. The possible is what stops, comma, being written. Or rather, what would stop, taking the path of being written in the event that the discourse I have mentioned would at last come to be, a discourse such that it is not semblance.

Is it impossible for truth ever to be produced by savoir-faire? No, it isn't, but then it shall only be half-said, incarnated in a signifier S subscript 1, right where it takes at least two of them for The Woman, the one and only, She who is mythical in the sense that the myth makes her singular – it's Eve, whom I spoke about just now – ever to have been incontestably possessed, for having tasted the fruit of the forbidden tree, the tree of Knowledge.

L'Ève, then, is not mortal. She is no more mortal than Socrates. The Woman in question is another name of God, and it is in this respect that she doesn't exist, as I've said many times.

You will notice Aristotle's cunning here, not wanting the singular to play a role in his logic. Now, contrary to what he allowed in the aforesaid logic, it has to be said that Socrates is not a man, because he agrees to die so that the city will live on. He accepts this, and this is a fact. Moreover, it really has to be said that on this occasion he doesn't want to hear his wife speak. Hence my formula about woman, which I'm pegging out, as it were, for your use, by using the μὴ πάντες, which is the opposition, dismissed by Aristotle, to the universal of the πάν, and which I picked out from the Organon.

I haven't managed to find it again, but I did read it there, sure enough that my daughter, who is here today, put her finger on it and swore to me earlier that she would find the place again for me. Woman is not all but in the equivocal form that takes on its piquancy from this lalingua of ours, in the form of but not that, as when one says, anything, but not that. This was precisely Socrates' position. The but not that is what, under this year's title, I'm introducing as the sinthome.

At this instant, at the instance of the letter such as it has so far been outlined – and don't expect any better, because whatever might be more effective would do no better than to displace the sinthome, even to multiply it – for the present instance, there is the sinthome masaquinas, which I spell however you like.

You know that Joyce had slaved quite enough over this saint homme. As far as philosophy is concerned, no one's ever done any better. One has to put things as best one can – it's the only true thing there is. This doesn't prevent Joyce from not really making head or tail of it with respect to the thing by which he sets such great store, namely what he calls Beauty. On this point, have a look at Jacques Aubert's book and you'll see that in the sinthomasaquinas there is goodness knows what exactly which he calls claritas, which Joyce replaces with something along the lines of the radiance of Being, which is really the weak point at issue.

Is this a personal weakness? I don't find the radiance of Being to be all that striking. And it is in precisely this respect that Joyce strips the sinthome of its masaquinism.

Contrary to how things might appear at first glance, namely somewhat detached from politics, this produced what I shall call the sint'home rule. The Freeman's Journal represented this Home Rule as a sun rising behind the Bank of Ireland. As if by chance, Joyce has it come up in the northwest, which is not usual for a sunrise. Despite the squeaking that we meet on this subject in Joyce, it's none the less the sinthome roule, the rolling sinthome, on rollers, that Joyce conjoins.

It's quite certain that these two terms could be given different names. I'm naming them this way on account of the two aspects available to Joyce's art, which will be keeping us busy this year in view of what I said earlier, which I introduced, and which I did no better than call by the name he deserves, that suits him, by changing its spelling.

Both spellings concern him, but it's a fact that Joyce makes a choice, and in this regard he is, like me, a heretic. For haeresis is precisely what specifies the heretic. One has to choose the path by which to capture the truth – especially since, once the choice has been made, no one is prevented from subjecting it to confirmation, that is, from being a heretic in the right way.

The right way is the one that, when the nature of the sinthome has been recognized, doesn't shrink from using it logically, that is, from using it to the point of reaching its real, at the end of which it is sated.

2

Joyce did that, but in an approximate fashion, of course, because one couldn't get off to a worse start than he did.

Being born in Dublin with a boozing father who was more or less a Fenian, that is, a fanatic, from two families, because that's how it turns out for everyone when one is a son of two families and when it so happens that one believes oneself to be male because one has a little scrap of a dick. Pardon me for this word, but naturally it takes more than that. However, since his dick was a bit lax, as it were, his art supplemented his phallic allure. And this is always the way. The phallus is the conjunction between what I've called this parasite, which is the little scrap of a dick in question, and the function of speech. And it is in this respect that his art is the true guarantor of his phallus.

Aside from that, let's say that he was a pauvre hère, a poor wretch, and even a pauvre hérétique. The Joyceans who have enjoyment of his heresy are only to be found in academia. But Joyce quite deliberately wanted this breed to busy themselves with him. The best of it is that he managed, and beyond all measure. It has lasted, and will last further still. He expressly wanted three hundred years of it. He said he wanted to keep the critics busy for three hundred years, and this he shall achieve, provided God doesn't a-Thomize us.

Ce hère – one cannot say cet hère, the aspirated h forbids it and this even bothers everyone so much that they say le pauvre hère – this wretch conceived of himself as a hère-o. Stephen Hero is the title expressly given to the book from which he prepared A Portrait of the Artist as a Young Man.

I would have liked at least to show you the edition to get but I didn't bring the book along, which is really daft of me. It's hard to find, which is why I'm telling you how much you will have to insist. Nicole Sels, who is here today, sent me a very precise note – more what you'd call a letter – where over two pages she explains that currently it's impossible to get hold of this text, along with its criticism by different people, all of whom are academics. Besides, to write on Joyce is one way of getting into the university. The university draws in Joyceans. It gives them degrees. They're already in a good position. In short, you won't find the . . . – I don't know how to pronounce this name. Jacques Aubert will tell me. Is it Beeb or Beeb-ie?

– Usually, one says Beeb-ie.

He's at the top of the list, with an article on Joyce that's in a class of its own. Further down you have Hugh Kenner who in my opinion speaks fairly well about Joyce, perhaps because of the Saint Thomas Aquinas in question. And then there are others right up to the end. I regret that you won't be able to have this book at your disposal.

Truth be told, it was a schoolboy blunder on my part, if ever there was one, to have shrunk the characters of this short note. You'll have to make arrangements with Nicole Sels to get a series of photocopies made. As I reckon there are not that many of you who are up to scratch in English, especially Joyce's English, this should only be a small number, but clearly there will be some competition, my goodness, legitimate competition.

A Portrait of the Artist . . . You have to write Artist with all the stress on the. This the is not entirely the same as our French definite article of course. But one can trust Joyce. If he says the, it's because he really reckons that, when it comes to the artist, he's the only one. In this, he is singular.

. . . as a Young Man is very suspect. In French, that would translate as comme. In other words, what is at issue is the comme-ment, the how.

The French is telling on this point. When one employs an adverb when one speaks, when one says real-ly, mental-ly, heroic-ly, adding on this –ly already in itself tells you that one is ly-ing. There is something of a lie in any adverb. This is no accident. When we interpret, we must pay attention to this.

Someone who is fairly close to me made the remark with regard to the tongue, in so far as this designates the instrument of speech, that it is also the tongue that carries what are called taste buds. Well, I retorted that ce qu'on dit ment is not for nothing.[6]

It's good of you to chuckle, but it's not funny because when all is said and done the equivoque is all we have as a weapon against the symptom.

It so happens that I afford myself the luxury of supervising, as they call it, a certain number of people who have authorized themselves, each on their own, to be analysts, in keeping with my formula. There are two stages. There is a stage when they go like a rhino. They go barging in any old how, and I always go along with them. Indeed, they are always right. The second stage consists in playing on the equivoque that might free up something of the sinthome.

Indeed, interpretation operates solely through equivoques. There has to be something in the signifier that resonates.

It comes as a surprise that this wasn't even remotely apparent to the British philosophers. I'm calling them philosophers because they're not psychoanalysts. They staunchly believe that speech doesn't have any effects. They're wrong. They do entertain the existence of drives, but even then, only when they are good enough not to translate Trieb as instinct. They don't entertain the idea that the drives are the echo in the body of a fact of saying.

For this fact of saying to resonate, for it to be consonant, to use another word of sinthome masaquinas, the body has to be sensitive to it. And it's a fact that it is. The body is sensitive to it because it has a few orifices, the most important of which is the ear because it can't be sealed, shut, or closed off. It is because of this that there is a response in the body to what I have called the voice.

The trouble is surely that there is not only the ear. The gaze also puts up some stiff competition.

More geometrico. Because of form, the form that was so dear to Plato, the individual presents himself just as he has been put together, as a body. And this body possesses such a power of captivation that up to a certain point one should be envious of the blind. How might a blind man, assuming he knows how to use braille, read Euclid?

The astonishing thing is that form offers up nothing more than the bag, or, if you like, the bubble, because it's something that inflates.

The obsessional is more stricken by this than anyone else because, as I said somewhere and was reminded recently, he belongs to the same register as the frog who wanted to be as big as an ox. A certain fable allows us to see the effects of that. It's particularly difficult, as we know, to wrench the obsessional away from the stranglehold of the gaze.

The bag, such as it is envisaged in the set theory that Cantor founded, is made manifest, or even demonstrated – if every demonstration is to be held to demonstrate the imaginary that it implies – as fit to be connoted with an ambiguity between 1 and 0. This is the only fitting support for the confines of the empty set, which imposes itself in this theory. Hence our scription S_1 which, I specify, is read S subscript 1. It does not form the unity of one, but it indicates that it is an empty bag, since it is able to contain nothing.

It none the less remains that an empty bag is still a bag, namely the one that can be imagined only on the basis of the ex-sistence and the consistence that the body possesses on account of being a pot. This ex-sistence and this consistence have to be held to be real, since the real is the fact of holding them together, hence the word Begriff, which means precisely that.

The imaginary here shows its homogeneity with the real, and it shows that this homogeneity is due solely to the fact of number, in so far as number is binary, 1 or 0. This means that it only supports 2 by dint of 1 not being 0, by dint of 1 ex-sisting relative to 0, but it doesn't consist in any of it.

So it is that Cantor's theory has to start afresh from the pair, but then the set stands in third place. The conjunction between the first set and what amounts to the Other doesn't come about. This is precisely why the symbol offloads onto the imaginary.

The symbol carries the subscript 2, indicating that it is a pair, that is to say, that it introduces division in the subject, whoever this subject might be, through whatever is uttered here de facto. Since this fact remains suspended from the enigma of enunciation, which is simply a fact closed in upon itself – the fact of the fact, as it is written, le faîte du fait, the pinnacle of the fact, or le fait du faîte, the fact of the pinnacle, as it is said. The facts are equal in fact. Equivocal and equivalent, the fact is thereby the limit of what is said.

What is incredible is that men saw quite clearly that the symbol could only be a fractured part, and that this has been so, as it were, since time immemorial. But what is also incredible is that they didn't see at the time, the time of this immemorial time, that this entailed the unity and the reciprocity of the signifier and the signified – and that consequently the originary signified doesn't mean anything, that it is only a sign of arbitration between two signifiers – a sign of arbitration and, due to this fact, there is no arbitrariness in choosing between them.

Arbitration or, to say it in English, umpire. That's how Joyce writes it. There is only any umpire on the basis of empire, on the basis of the imperium over the body, just as everything bears its mark following the trial by ordeal.

Here the 1 confirms its detachment from the 2. It only makes 3 through imaginary forcing, the same that imposes a kind of will that suggests to one to manhandle the other, without being bound to either of them.

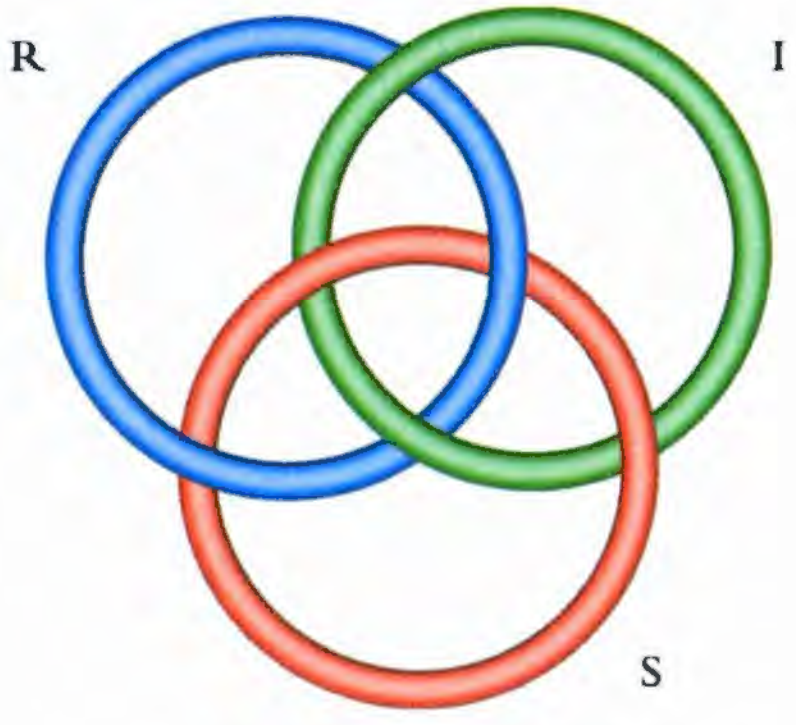
3

For the condition to have been expressly posited that, starting with three rings, a link is made such that a break in one of the rings, the middle one, if I may put it in a somewhat abridged form, sets the other two, whichever they may be, free from one another, it had to be noticed that this had been inscribed on the coat of arms of the Borromeo family.

The so-called nœud borroméen was thus already there without anyone being shrewd enough to learn a lesson from it.[7]

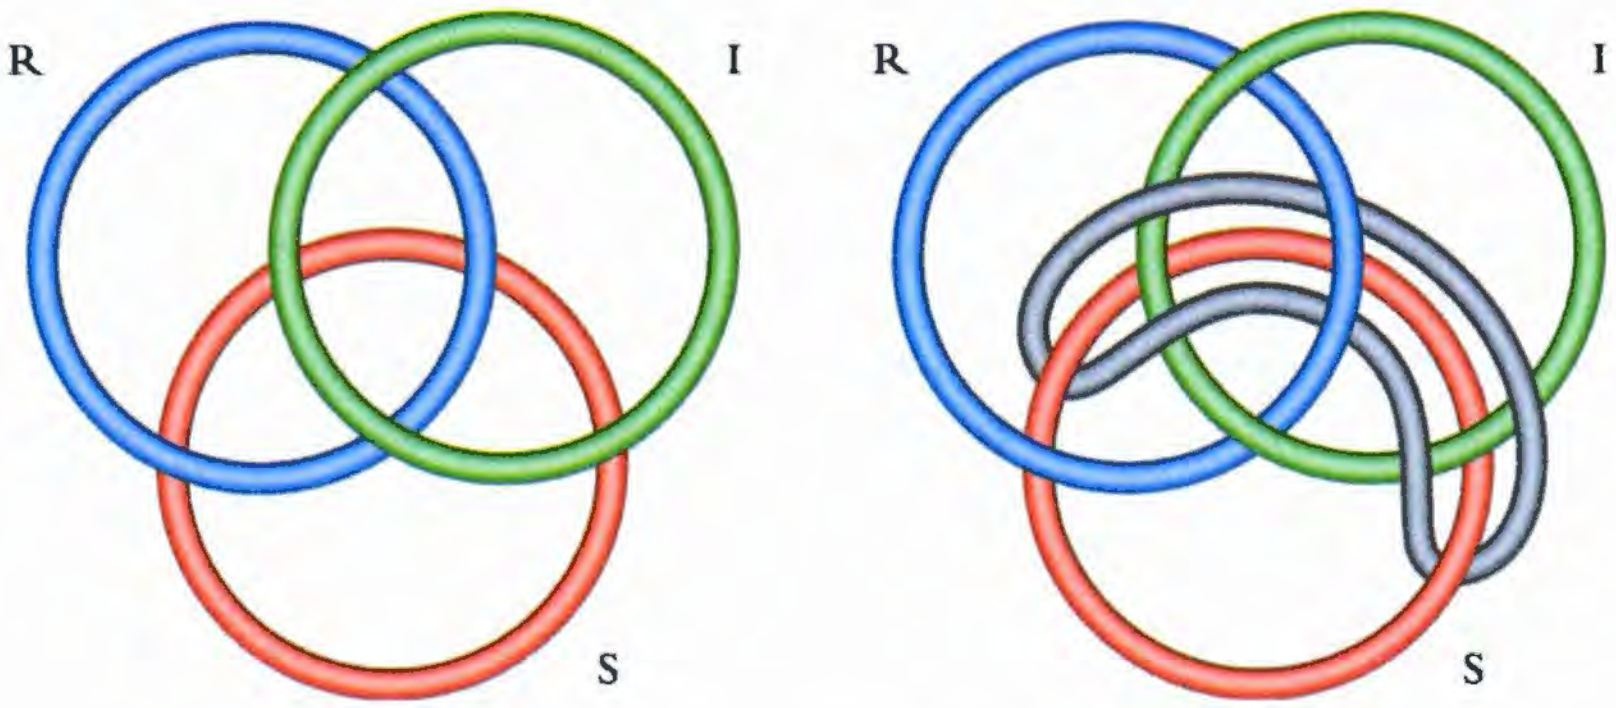
It is precisely here that we find what lies behind the error of thinking that this knot is a norm for the relationship between the three functions that only exist one relative to the other in their implementation within the being who, forming a knot, believes himself to be a man. It is not a break between the symbolic, the imaginary, and the real that defines perversion, it is that they already stand apart in such a way that a fourth term has to be supposed, which on this occasion is the sinthome.

I'm saying that what forms the Borromean link has to be supposed to be tetradic – that perversion merely means version vers le père, a version towards the father – and that all in all, the father is a symptom, or a sinthome, as you wish. The ex-sistence of the symptom is what is im-ply-cated by the very position that presupposes this enigmatic bond between the imaginary, the symbolic, and the real.



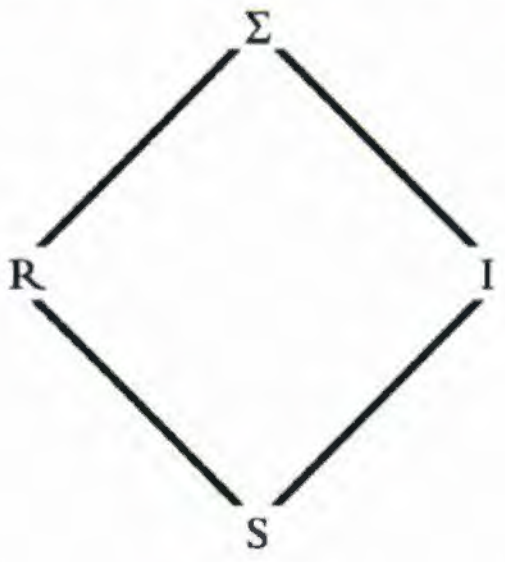
The Borromean link[8]

The following figuration, here on the left, is a diagram of the imaginary, the symbolic, and the real, each separate from the other. Already, in my previous planar diagrams, you have the possibility of binding them together. With what? With the sinthome, the fourth ring.



The three separate rings (left);
the rings linked by the fourth ring, the sinthome (right) [9]

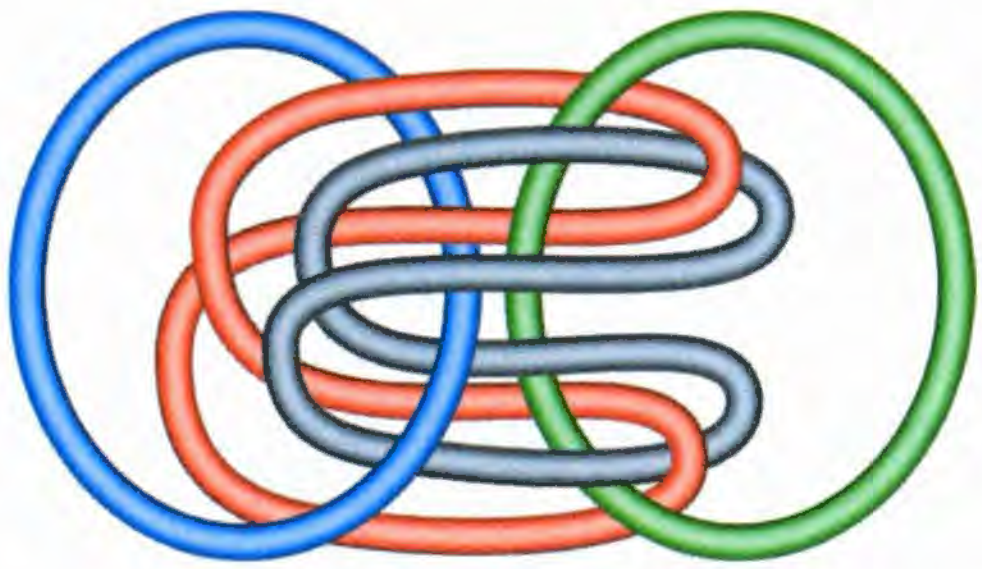
That gives you this relationship, namely, the imaginary, the real, the symptom – which I'm writing here with a sigma – and the symbolic. Each one is interchangeable in a way that will, I hope, strike you as quite straightforward. To spell it out, 1 onto 2 can permute to 2 onto 1, while 3 onto 4 can permute to 4 onto 3.



I R Σ S
1 2 3 4
2 1 4 3

The combinatory I R Σ S

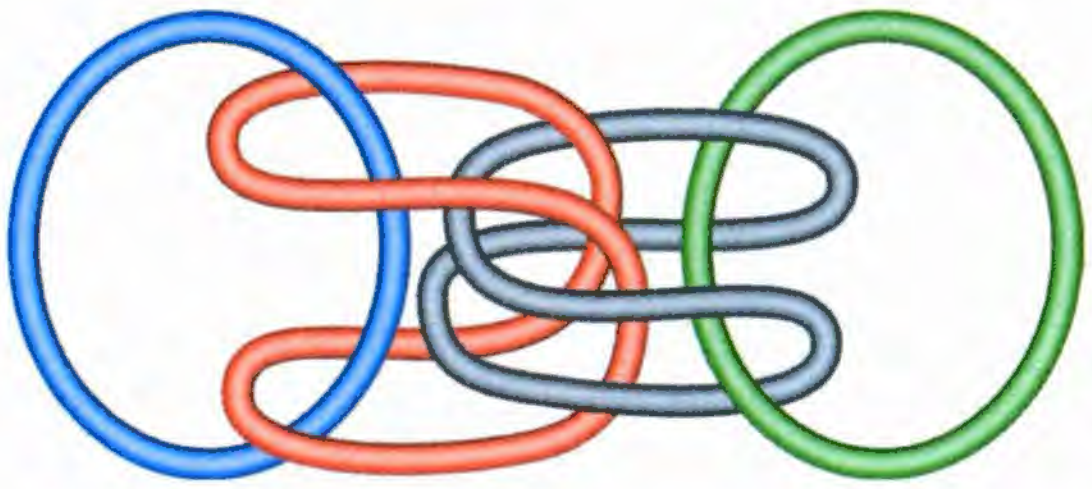
We find ourselves in the situation where the link of 1 onto 2, indeed of 2 onto 1, has in the midst of it, as it were, the 3 and the 4, that is, the Σ and the S. In what way do the symptom and the symbol find themselves caught between the real and the imaginary? I'll show you with this simple configuration.



The four-component Borromean link, showing the symptom and the symbol between the real and the imaginary

On the left, you can see four bights being pulled by the capital R ring, while on the right the I ring commingles with them in a certain way by passing over the symbol and under the symptom. In other words, the two in the middle – the symptom and the symbol – present themselves in such a way that one of the far-end terms takes them up in their entirety, while the other far-end term passes over the one that is on top and under the one that is underneath. It is in this form that the bond I expressed through the opposition between R and I presents itself.

I shall also add a different figure, a symmetrical one, which you regularly get when trying to make a four-component Borromean knot.



Symmetrical figuration of the four-component Borromean link

The Oedipus complex is, as such, a symptom. Everything is sustained in so far as the Name-of-the-Father is also the Father of the Name, which doesn't make the symptom any the less necessary.

The Other at issue manifests itself in Joyce by the fact that, all in all, he is tasked with a father. To the extent that he must support this father for him to subsist, as is borne out by Ulysses, Joyce, through his art – this art which is always that which, down through the ages, comes to us as emanating from the artisan – not only makes his family subsist, but illustriates it, as it were. By the same token he illustriates what somewhere he calls my country, or better still, the uncreated conscience of my race, on which he ends A Portrait of the Artist. This is the mission Joyce sets himself.

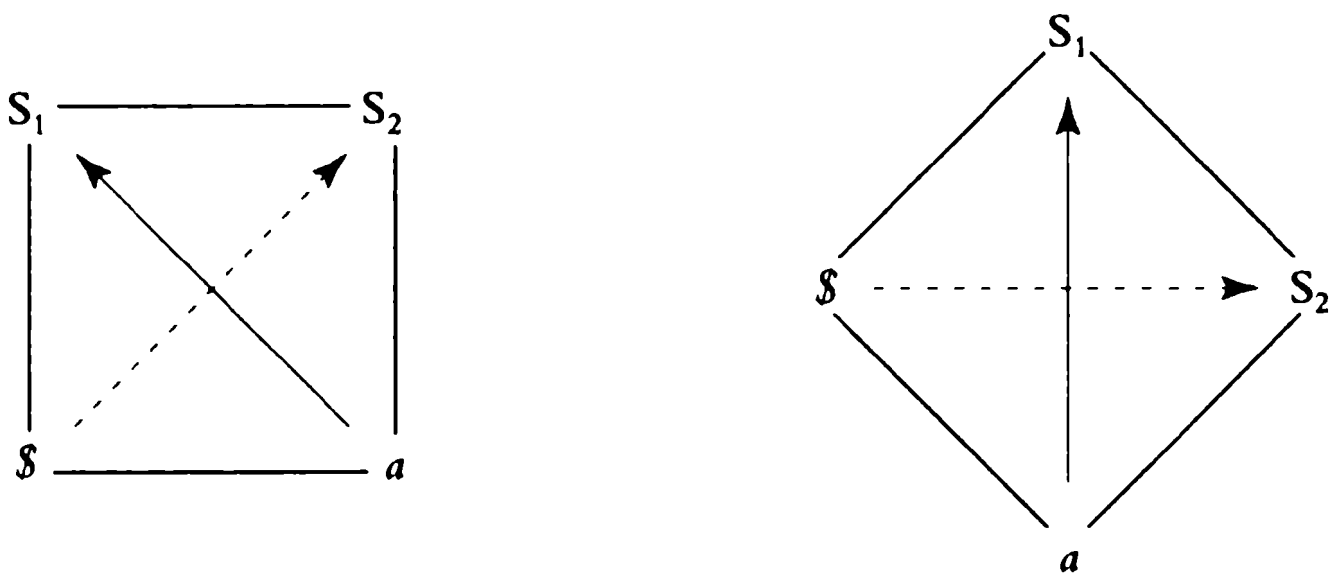
In this sense, I am hereby announcing what this year shall be my examination of art.

In what way is artifice expressly able to target what presents itself in the first instance as a symptom? In what way can art – the artisanal – foil, as it were, what imposes as a symptom? Namely, truth.

4

I included truth in my two tetrahedrons.



Tetrahedral schemas of the discourse of the master

Where is the truth in this setting? I said that in the discourse of the master it stood as something that is supposed in the subject, barred S. In so far as he is divided, the subject is still subject to the fantasy. It is there, at barred S, at the level of truth, that we must consider the half-saying.

At this stage, the subject can only represent himself with the signifier subscript 1, S_1. As for the signifier subscript 2, S_2, there stands the artisan, in so far as through the conjunction of two signifiers he is capable of producing what I have called the object a.

Earlier I illustrated this by the relationship with the ear and with the eye, even evoking the closed mouth. I have offered a figuration of division with the duplicity of the symbol and the symptom.

In so far as the discourse of the master reigns, the S_2 is divided.

The division at issue is that between the symbol and the symptom. This division is reflected, so to speak, in the subject's division. It is because the subject is what one signifier represents relative to another signifier that we are required by its insistence to show that it is in the symptom that one of these two signifiers from the symbolic derives its support.

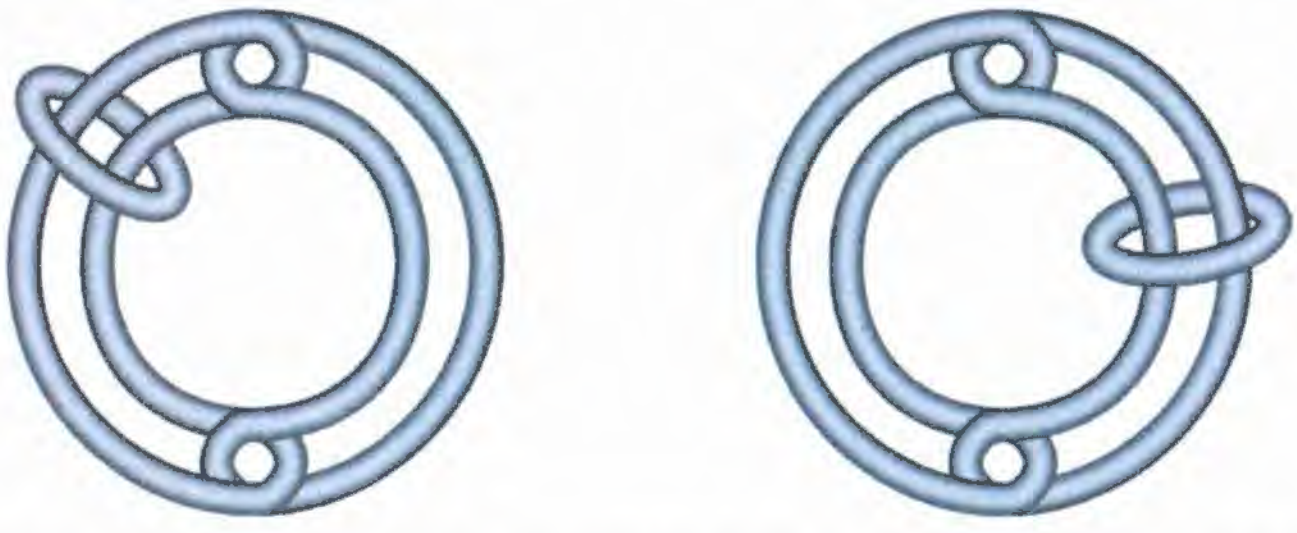
In this sense, in the symptom's articulation with the symbol, there is, I shall say, merely a false hole.

Supposing the consistency of any one of these functions – symbolic, imaginary or real – to form a circle presupposes a hole. But something else is at stake in the case of the symbol and the symptom.

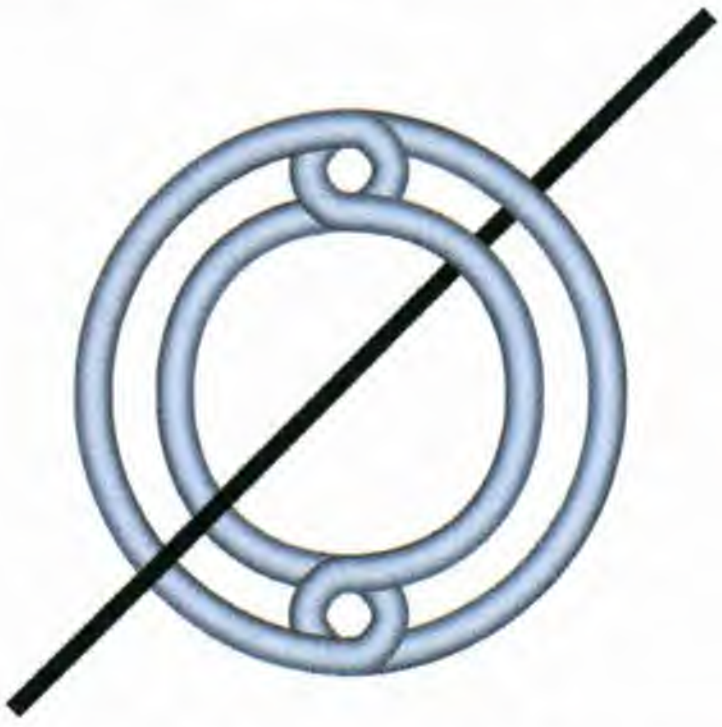
The false hole of the symbol and the symptom[10]

What makes a hole here is the full length of one circle folded over the full folded length of the other. But this is a false hole. For us to have something that might be qualified as a true hole, we have to surround, to enclose, one of the circles with a consistence that makes them hold together, which looks like an air cavity, what in topology we call a torus. Pierre Soury – to cite him by name, I don't know if he's here today – has set this out rather well.



A true hole obtained from a false hole by enclosing one of the folded circles[11]

This also means that, for the hole to subsist, to be maintained, one has simply to imagine a straight line here. So long as this straight line stretches to infinity it will fulfil the same role.



A true hole obtained by adding a straight line stretching to infinity

Over the course of the year we are going to have to look again at what this infinity is. We are going to have to look again at just what a straight line is, what makes it subsist, and in what way it is akin, as it were, to a circle.

I will most certainly have to look again at the circle, too. It has a function with which the police are very well acquainted. The circle is used for circulation. It is in precisely this respect that the police possess a support that's been around for some time. Hegel saw its function very clearly. For the police, it is simply a matter of keeping things turning round. This form is certainly not what is in question here.

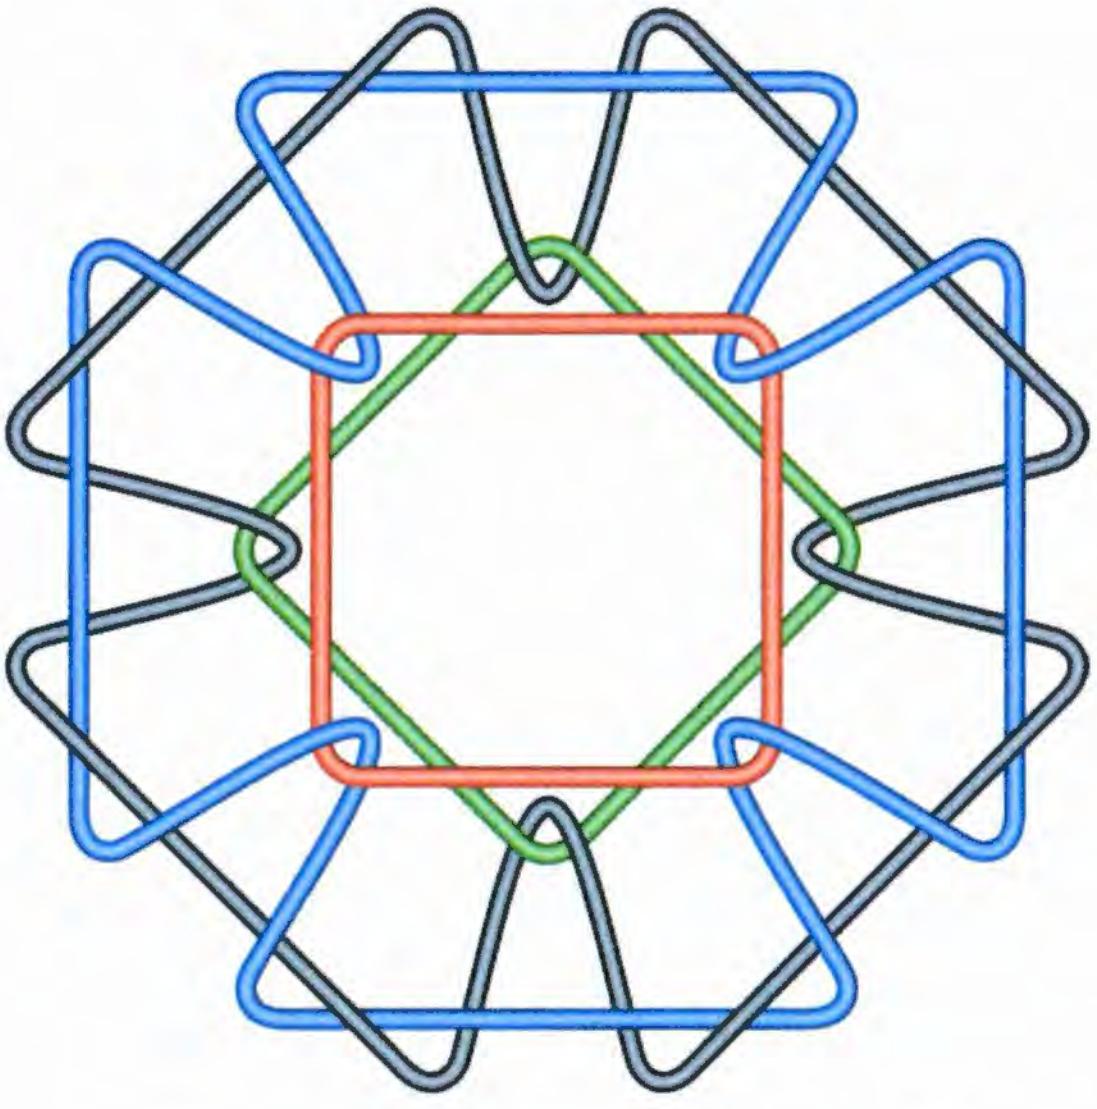
That simply adding an infinite straight line to the false hole should turn it into a hole that subsists in a Borromean fashion, this is the fact on which I shall stop for today.

18 November 1975

II

ON WHAT MAKES A HOLE IN THE REAL

The fourth ring
A geometry forbidden to the imaginary
Meeting Chomsky
No hope of escaping from feeble-mindedness
On an art that substantializes the symptom



Figuration of the four-component link

It can't go on like this. There are too many of you.

Well, I still hope to get from you what I got from the audience over in the United States, where I have just spent a busy fortnight.

I was able to take in a certain number of things over there, and in particular, if I understood correctly, a certain weariness that is being felt principally by the analysts.

I can only say, good gracious, that I was treated exceedingly well, which is not to say very much, is it? To use a term which is the same one I use for the situation of mankind, I felt I was being more or less drawn in, or, if you would care to hear this, I was sucked in – sucked into a kind of whirlwind that only finds some ready response in what I have been bringing to the fore with my knot.

1

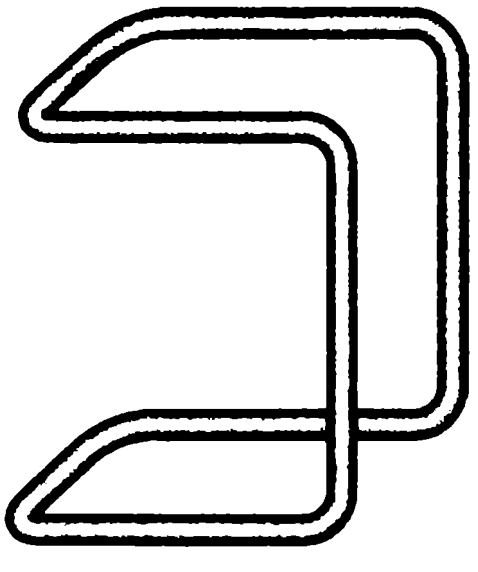
As those of you who've been here for a while now have been able to see, well, to hear, it is not by chance, but rather little by little, step by step, that I have come round to expressing by means of the function of the knot what I initially put forward as the triple alliance of the symbolic, the imaginary, and the real.

The knot is formed in the spirit of a new mos geometricus. Mos means mode or manner. Initially, we are always captivated by a kind of geometry that last time I qualified as being comparable with the bag, that is, the surface.

Pondering commonly happens with eyes shut. When one ponders the knot – you can have a go at it, it's very hard – one can make neither head nor tail of it. So I'm not really sure that I've got this one right for you, though it does seem so to my eye.

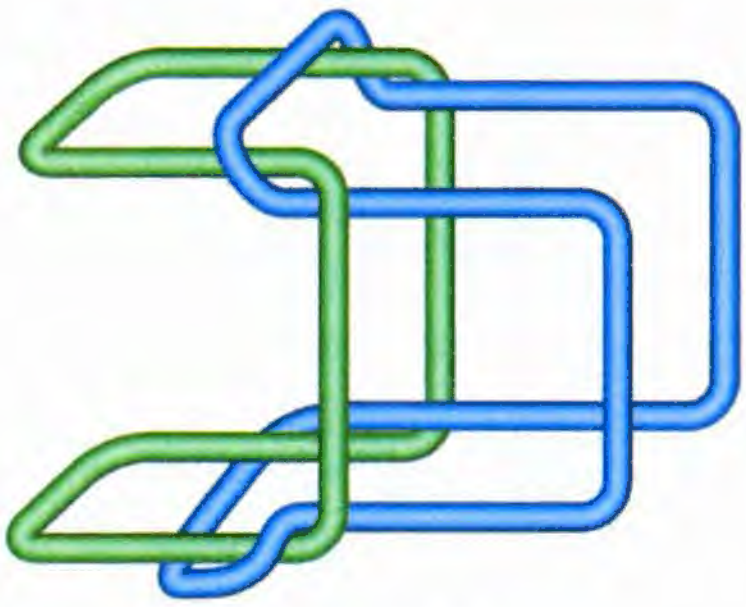
No, it looks like there's a mistake. In fact, yes, there's a mistake here. There you go, because this part here needs to be removed.

This four-component knot is constructed using this, which you're quite familiar with. You have this shape in a Borromean knot.



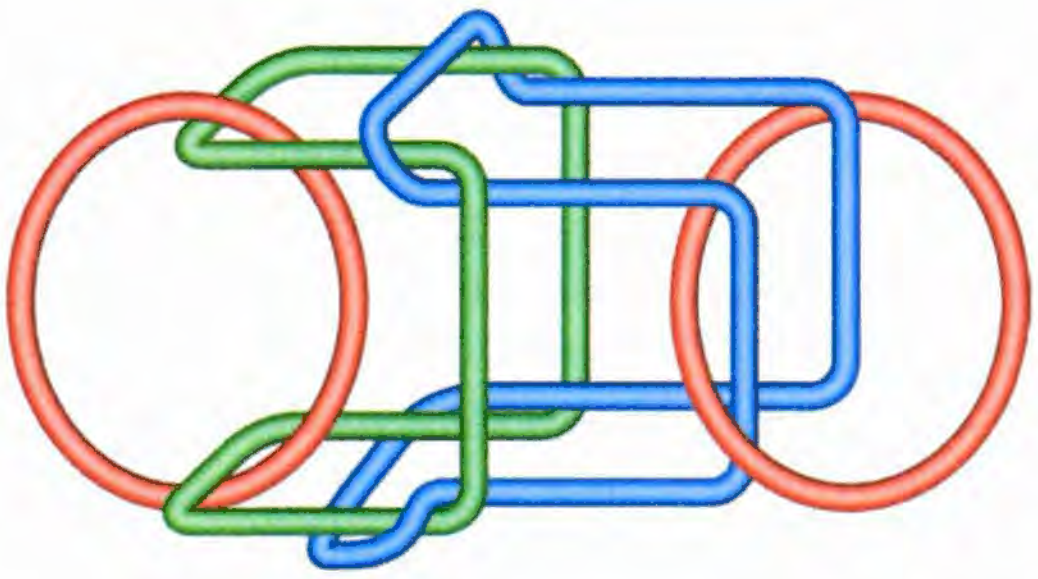
Folded shape from the four-component link

As it happens, this is duplicated.



Double folded shape

Then you have to finish it off with two further rings.



Second figuration of the four-component link

There is another way of drawing and duplicating the folded shape, making the two folds hook onto one another.

Another figuration of the double folded shape

And there is a third way, which consists in employing this, which I happen to have already shown you once, and which in and of itself constitutes a closed circle.

Third figuration of the double folded shape

However, in the two shapes that I presented before, the two circuits in the middle can be handled in such a way that they can be set free from one another. This is why the two circles traced out here in red can turn this into a Borromean knot, that is to say, a knot in which sectioning any one of the circles will free the others.[1]

2

Analysis is, in sum, the reduction of initiation to its reality, that is to say, to the fact that strictly speaking there is no initiation. Every single subject in analysis reveals how he is always and only ever a supposition.

None the less, experience demonstrates that this supposition is always given over to what I shall call an ambiguity. I mean that the subject as such is always, not only double, but divided. It's a matter of accounting for what it is in this division that makes for something real.

On this point we have to come back to Freud, since he is the one who was the great trailblazer in apprehending this.

On the back cover of Erich Fromm's latest book, which you can easily get, if memory serves, from Gallimard,[2] one can read what is set out as la psychanalyse appréhendée à travers son 'père', psychoanalysis apprehended through its 'father'. In what way did Freud, a bourgeois if I've read correctly, a bourgeois brimming with prejudices, reach something that holds the specific value of what he said, which is certainly no small matter, since its aim was to say the truth about mankind?

To which I've added the following rectification, which entailed its share of blood, sweat and tears for me, that the only truth is one that is said by half, just like the subject that it entails. To express it as I stated it, truth can only be half-said.

My starting point is my condition, which is that of bringing to Man what the Scripture states, not as an help meet for him, but as a helpmeet against him. I try to take my bearings from this condition, and this is truly what led me, in a way that is worth remarking upon, to considering the knot.

This consideration is constituted by a geometry that may be said to be forbidden to the imaginary, because it can only be imagined through all kinds of resistances and, indeed, difficulties. This is what the knot substantifies in so far as it is Borromean.

One of the things that struck me most when I was in the US was my meeting with Chomsky, which was altogether intentional on my part. I was quite taken aback, and I told him so. What made me sense the great distance that lies between us was that he simply affirmed to me, in person, one idea that I realized was his own. I can't say that this idea is refutable, because it's the most commonplace idea, but it does strike me as a precarious one.

This idea starts off from the consideration of something that presents itself as a body, conceived of as being equipped with organs. This conception implies that the organ is a tool, a tool for grasping or apprehending, and there is no objection in principle to the tool apprehending itself as such. So it is that Chomsky considers language, among other things, to be determined by a genetic fact. In a word, language is itself an organ. He said as much, right there in front of me, in those very words.

It strikes me as altogether startling – this is what I was expressing in saying that I was taken aback – that one should be able to turn this language into a return upon itself as an organ. Indeed, to my mind, if one doesn't admit the principial truth that language is tied to something that makes a hole in the real, it is not simply difficult but impossible to consider how it is handled. Observational method cannot start off from language without accepting the fact that, in what can be situated as real, language only emerges in making a hole. It is on the basis of this function of the hole that language effects its purchase on the real.

It's not easy for me to impress upon you the full weight of this conviction. This is a conviction that to my eye is unavoidable, given that truth as such is only possible when this real is hollowed out. Moreover, language eats into the real.

To speak as Chomsky does, see if you will what this genetic real is all about. Language only enables it to be approached in terms of signs, in other words, messages. The molecular gene is reduced to what secured the reputation of Crick and Watson, namely the double helix from which the various tiers that organize the body at a number of different levels are deemed to set off. First there is division, development, and cellular specialization. Next there is specialization based on hormones, which act as vehicles for all sorts of messages that direct the organic information. With all these so-called messages, we arrive at a great spiriting away of what the real actually involves.

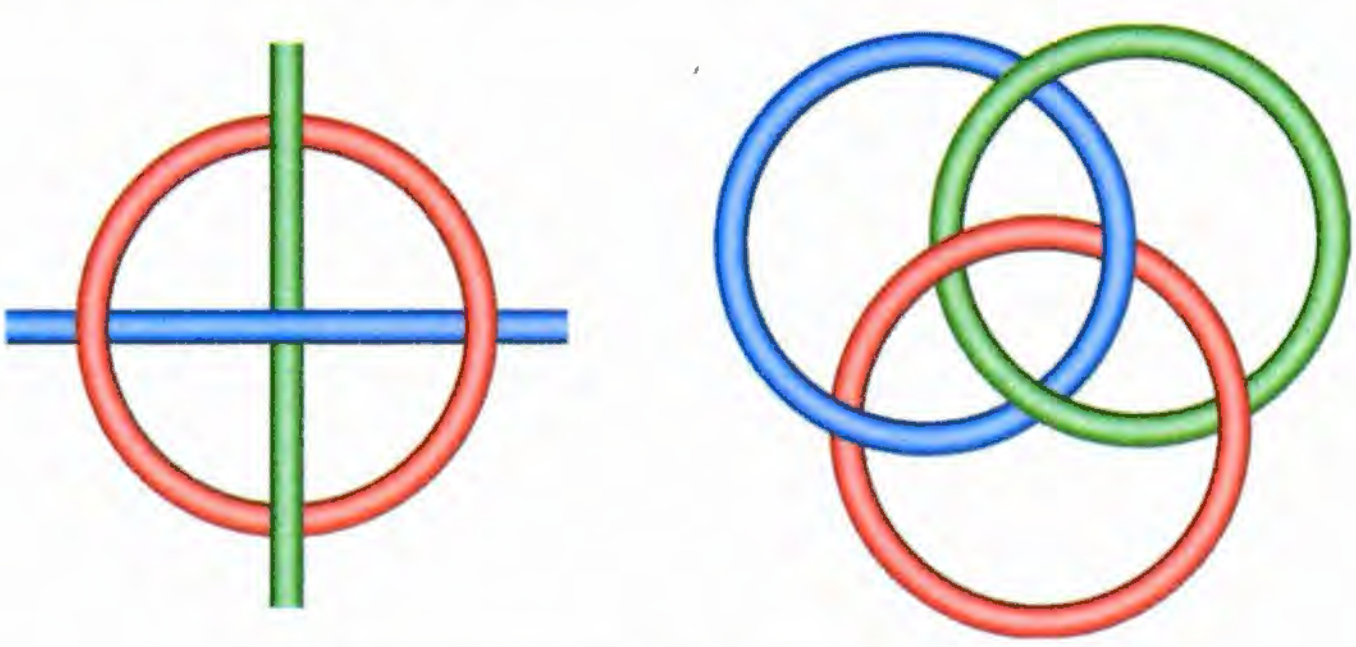
This is still, however, nothing more than a veil that has been drawn over what lies behind the efficacy of language, that is, over the fact that language is not in itself a message, but rather is only sustained by the function of what I've called the hole in the real.

For this, there exists the path of our new mos geometricus, that is, the substance that results from the specific efficacy of language, and which is supported by the function of the hole.

To express this in the terms of the much-vaunted Borromean knot that I've been relying on, let's say that it hinges entirely on the equivalence between a circle and a straight line stretching to infinity.

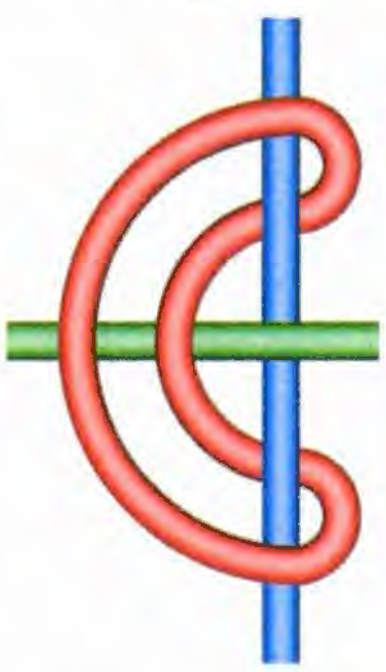
3

The diagram of the Borromean knot is this one, here on the left. It is just as Borromean as my usual drawing, here on the right.



Two figurations of the Borromean link[3]

This is also true of the following drawing.

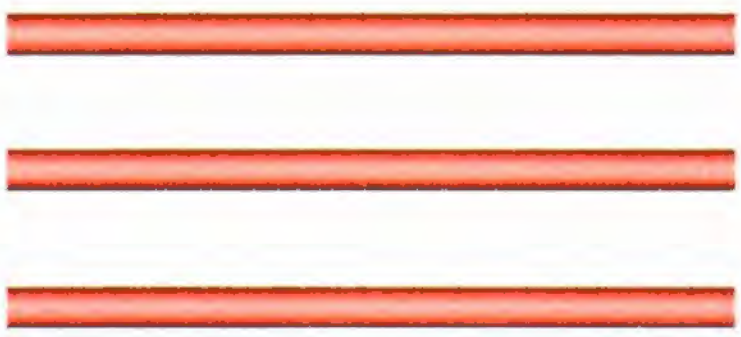


A further figuration of the Borromean link

Thus it emerges that you get the same Borromean knot when you replace the three circles with this one circle together with this pair of straight lines that we suppose stretch to infinity.

To account correctly for the Borromean knot it should be emphasized that it is on the basis of three that a requirement originates. The cipher 3 is the threshold, if I may say so, of the specific requirement of the knot.[4]

It is possible, through a perfectly straightforward manipulation, to make these three infinite straight lines run parallel. To achieve this you would just have to make the folded circle, the red one, more pliable.



Parallel straight lines stretching to infinity

It is starting from the 3 that we have to define what is at stake in the straight line's point at infinity. This is what allows us on no account to make any mistake about what we may call their concentricity. Let's place the three points at infinity, which complete the straight lines, here.

Infinite straight lines completed by their points at infinity

We can also permute these positions and make it so that this first infinite line envelops the others instead of being enveloped by them. The characteristic of this point at infinity is that it cannot be situated, as one might express oneself, on any side.

However, in starting off from 3, to figure it in this imaged fashion, you have the following requirement. You can sense that there are reasons why I had to trace these circles out in different colours, whereas just before I was drawing the three straight lines, completed by their points at infinity, in red.

A further figuration of the Borromean link

Not one of these circles, despite being enveloped by one of the two others, fails to envelop the third. This is what constitutes the property of the Borromean knot, a property with which I've acquainted you on several occasions now. In this third dimension, as it were, the Borromean knot consists in this relationship which means that what is enveloped with respect to one of the circles finds itself enveloping with respect to the other one.

It is in this respect that the following figure is exemplary, which you usually see in the form of the armillary sphere, which is used for sextants. To draw it out clearly, the blue circle will always swing in the following way around the circle I've drawn in green, while the red circle, in keeping with the inter-axial swing, has to be like this.

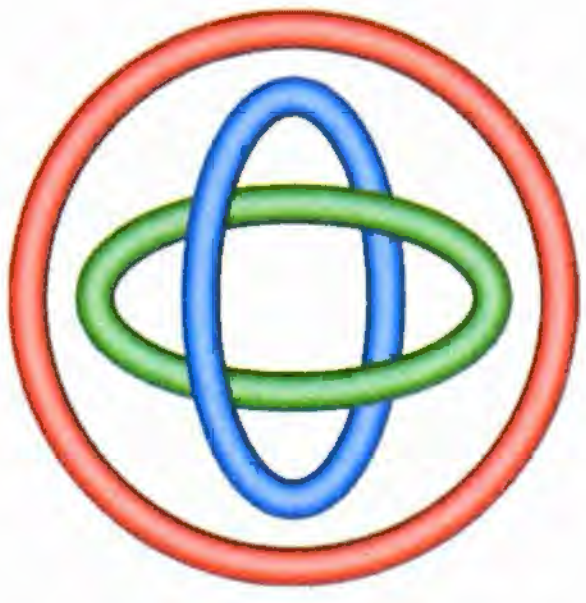

Diagram of the armillary sphere

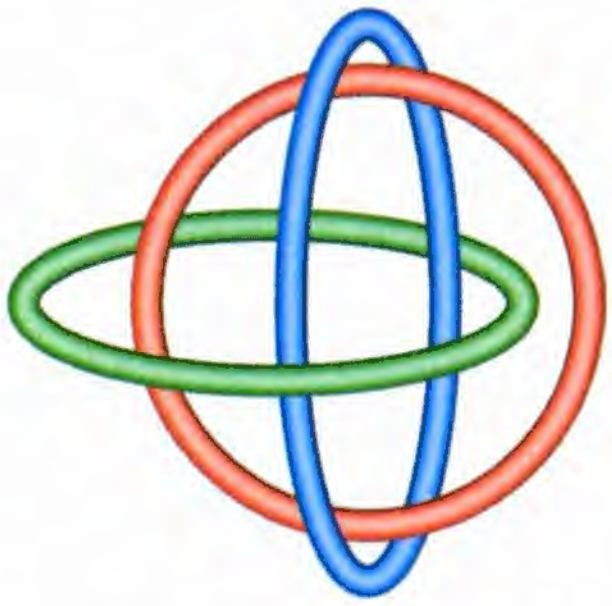
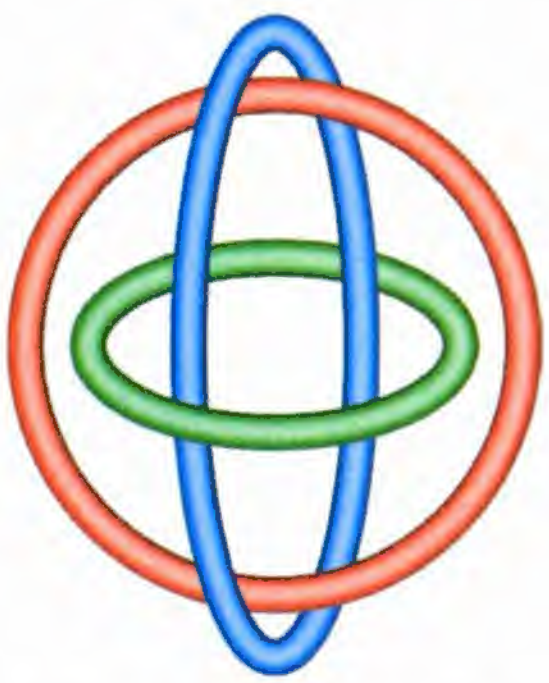
There is a difference between this arrangement, which is ordinary in any manipulation of the armillary sphere, and the following arrangement.



Faulty Borromean link

I'm redrawing it because this drawing is wrong. You can see how the green circle is situated in relation to the blue circle and the red circle. The blue circle, which here looks like it's the middle one, cannot swing around, because it envelops the red circle but is in turn enveloped by the green circle.



Correct Borromean link

Even my hesitations are significant here. They bring out the clumsiness with which the Borromean knot, which is the exemplar of the knot, is necessarily handled.

The fundamental character of this use of the knot is to illustrate the triplicity that results from a consistence that is assigned only on the basis of the imaginary, from a fundamental hole that emerges from the symbolic, and from an ex-sistence which belongs to the real, which is even its fundamental character.

This method, because it does indeed involve method, presents itself as something hopeless. There is no hope of breaking, in any way whatsoever, the constitutive knot of the symbolic, the imaginary, and the real. In this respect, let's put it in the most coherent way we can, it passes up what constitutes a virtue, a virtue that is even said to be theological. This is why our analytic appreciation of what is involved in the knot is the negative of religion.

We no longer believe in the object as such. It is in this respect that I reject that the object can be grasped by any organ.

When an organ is itself perceived as a tool, a tool that stands apart, it is thereby being conceived of as an object. In Chomsky's conception the object is not in itself broached except through an object. On the other hand, it is through the restitution of the subject as such, inasmuch as the subject can only be divided by the operation of language, that analysis finds the scope of its diffusion.

Analysis finds the scope of its diffusion in the fact that it calls into question science per se – science in so far as it makes an object into a subject, whereas it is the subject that is divided on his own account.

We don't believe in the object, but we observe desire, and from this observation of desire we induce the cause as something objectivized.

The desire to take cognizance meets obstacles. I invented the knot to embody such an obstacle. We need to become more accustomed to this knot. I mean that the knot alone is the conceivable support of a relationship between any one thing and any other thing. Although on one hand the knot is abstract, it must none the less be thought of and conceived of as something concrete.

In which respect, although today you can see that I'm really rather weary after my test in the US, I was nevertheless rewarded, as I told you, because I was able to stir up what I will call some agitation, some emotion, with these figures. You can see these figures here, more or less substantialized on account of being set down in written form, on account of being drawn. This doesn't prevent the sentiment of the mental, the sentimental, from being feeble-minded, because it can always be reduced from some angle or other to the imaginary.

The imagining of consistency makes straight for the impossible dimension of the fracture, but it is in this respect that a fracture can always be the real, the real as impossible. It is no less compatible with the said imagining, and even constitutes it.

I'm not hoping on any account to escape from feeble-mindedness, which I indicate as being present from the start. Just like anyone else, I only escape from it as far as my means allow. That is to say, like sur-place, like running on the spot, what is sûr about this place doesn't ensure any verifiable progress except in the long term.

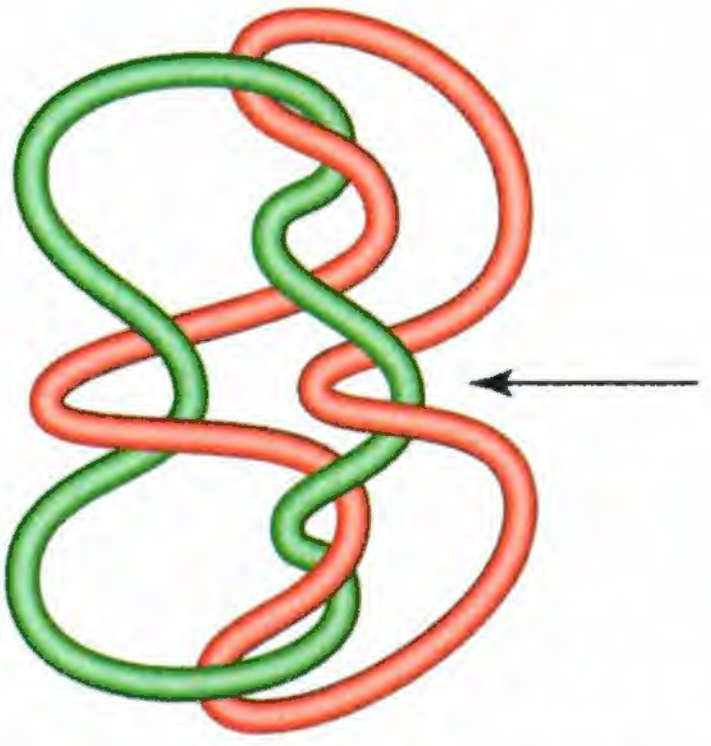
It is in a confabulatory way that I assert, in my way of pondering it in my lightweight ponder,[5] that real-ly, because indeed the real does lie, the real entails the hole that subsists within it, given that its consistence is no more than the consistence of the entirety of the knot that it forms with the symbolic and the imaginary.

This knot can be qualified as Borromean, which means that it cannot be sliced through without dissolving the myth that it renders of the subject as non-supposed, that is, as real. The latter displays no variation from any other body that may be indicated as a parlêtre, a body that has a status that is respectable, in the common sense of the word, only by virtue of this knot.

4

Joyce turns out to have targeted, in a privileged way, through his art, the fourth term known as the sinthome. I shall resume my disquisition next time by tackling this point.

You can see this fourth term figured in different ways up here on the board, be it in the red ring on the far right of the second diagram of the Borromean knot, or in the black ring, or even in the following.



New figuration of the folded circle

This is still the same folded circle. It's in a special position here, namely, with two inflexions, that is to say, caught up in itself at four points, so to speak.[6]

In the second figuration of the four-component knot, one or the other of the circles at the far ends wedges in, at two different points, the loop that is figured in one or the other of the folded circles. In the very first figuration, however, the black ring wedges in the green, or the blue ring wedges in the red, at four different points, because it is likewise essentially a matter of wedging.

It is still the case that it is through Joyce that I'm going to be broaching this fourth term in so far as it completes the knot of the imaginary, the symbolic, and the real.

The whole problem lies here. How can an art target in an expressly divinatory way the substantialization of the sinthome in its consistence, but also in its ex-sistence and in its hole?

How is it that someone has been able to target through his art the rendering of this fourth term – which I simply wanted to show you today as being essential to the Borromean knot – to the point of getting as close to it as it is possible to get?

5

After this exhausting task, because today I'm really feeling very weary, I'm expecting from you what I got with greater ease in the States than elsewhere, namely for someone to pose me a question, whatever it might be, about what I've said today.

I'm waiting for someone to speak up. Anyone.

So, what might have struck you as debatable in what I've put forward today?

Stuart Schneiderman – What led you to believe you'd get anything out of Chomsky? That's something that would never have occurred to me.

That is precisely why I was taken aback, sure. But we always possess something of this kind of weakness, don't we, some remnant of hope. Dealing as he does with linguistics, I might have hoped to see in Chomsky some slither of appreciation of what I have been showing with respect to the symbolic, namely that it preserves something of the hole, even when this hole is a false hole.

It's impossible, for instance, not to qualify the set formed by the symptom and the symbolic as a false hole. However, from another angle, the symptom subsists in so far as it is hooked onto language, at least if we believe that we can modify something in the symptom by means of a manipulation that is said to be interpretative, that is, by playing on meaning.

That Chomsky should assimilate to the real something that in my eyes belongs to the realm of the symptom, that is, that he should mix up the symptom and the real, is very precisely what took me aback.

Stuart Schneiderman – My next question might be a little oisive . . .

Oiseuse?

Stuart Schneiderman – Thank you. Being American . . .

Yes, you're American. And I thank you. I simply note that once again I'm only being questioned by an American. Well, I can only say how delighted I was, as it were, by the fact that in the US I had people who showed me in one way or another that my disquisition has not been in vain.

Stuart Schneiderman – It strikes me as impossible that someone could consider that Chomsky, who was educated in the new tradition derived from mathematical logic, which he picked up from Quine and Goodman at Harvard . . .

But Quine is no fool, huh!

Roland Chemama – Concerning the alternation between the body and speech, as you've been speaking for an hour and a half, and as you're seeking to have a more direct contact with someone, I wondered whether in a more general way there might not be an alternation between discourse and the body in the life of a subject. Without language, would this hole not exist due to the fact of a direct physical engagement with this real? I'm speaking about love and jouissance.

That's precisely what's at issue. All the same, it's very hard on this occasion not to consider the real as a thirdness. Let's say that what I'm soliciting by way of response is along the lines of a call to the real, not as something linked to the body, but as something different. Far from the body, there is the possibility of what last time I called resonance, or consonance. This consonance can be found at the level of the real. Between the two poles constituted by the body and language, the real is what establishes an accord.

Mr X. – You were saying earlier that Chomsky makes language an organ, and that you were taken aback by this. I was wondering whether this might not be due to the fact that you make libido an organ. I'm thinking of the myth of the lamella. I wonder whether this might not be the angle from which the question of the soul might be posed. Because casting aside the idea of putting distance between language and the organ can only be retrieved in the sense of an art if one cuts out the organ at the level at which you put it, at the level of libido.

Libido, as its name indicates, can only be a participant in the hole, just as much as the other modes by which the body and the real present themselves. Clearly this is where I'm trying to join up with the function of art. This is implied in a way by what has been left blank as a fourth term. When I say that art can even affect the symptom, this is what I'm going to be trying to substantialize. You're quite right to mention the myth known as the lamella myth. This hits the right note, and I thank you for it. It's along this line that I hope to continue.

Henri Cesbron-Lavau – When you speak about libido in the text on the lamella, you say that what is remarkable about it is its to-and-fro trajectory of invagination. Now, this image strikes me today as being able to function like the image of the cord, which is caught in a phenomenon of resonance, which undulates, which forms an antinode that rises and falls, and which forms nodes.

No, but it's not for nothing that in a cord the metaphor comes from what forms a knot. What I'm trying to do is to find what this metaphor refers to. If there are nodes and antinodes in a vibrating cord, then it's in so far as the knot is being referenced. I mean that language is being used in a way that goes much further than what is effectively being said. People are always limiting the scope of metaphor as such. That is to say, people limit it to a metonymy.

Henri Cesbron-Lavau – When you go from the three-component Borromean knot to the four-component knot, into which the symptom is introduced, the three-component Borromean knot vanishes as such.

That's quite right. It's no longer a knot. It's only held together by the symptom.

Henri Cesbron-Lavau – From this perspective, the hope for any cure in analysis seems to pose a problem.

There can be no radical reduction of the fourth term, not even in analysis, because Freud stated – we don't know by which path – that there is an Urverdrängung, a repression that can never be undone. It is in the very nature of the symbolic to include this hole. This hole is what I'm aiming at, and in it I recognize the Urverdrängung itself.

Henri Cesbron-Lavau – You've said that the Borromean knot can't constitute a model. Could you be more explicit?

The Borromean knot does not constitute a model in so far as it possesses something that imagination fails to grasp when it gets close to it. I mean that, as such, it resists the imagining of the knot. The mathematical approach to the knot in topology is insufficient.

I can nevertheless tell you about my experiences over the holidays.

Knot of three crossings, known as the trefoil knot

This here constitutes a knot, but not a knot between two elements, for there is only one.[7] This is the most straightforward form of knot there is, which you can make with any old piece of string. It is the same knot as the overhand knot, though it doesn't look the same.

I persevered in pondering this, this discovery I made, let's say, namely, that with this knot such as it is shown here, it is easy to demonstrate that a Borromean knot ex-sists.

You just have to think that you could place the same knot on an underlying surface, which is the duplicate surface without which we wouldn't be able to set down anything at all in written form with respect to the knots. It's very easy to bring about the following, by setting it down in writing, I mean – when you slip a homologous knot under, and then, at each new step, over the knot that I'm calling the underlying knot, you get with the greatest of ease a Borromean knot. It's easy to imagine this, although you don't come to imagine it straightaway. I had to discover it first.

With this trefoil knot, is there now any possibility of bringing about a four-component Borromean knot? I spent nearly two months racking my brains over this object. It really does have to be called an object.

I didn't manage to demonstrate that there ex-sists a way of knotting together four trefoil knots in a Borromean fashion. Well, that doesn't prove anything. That doesn't prove that it doesn't ex-sist.

Even yesterday evening, I was thinking only of managing to demonstrate for you that it ex-sists. The worst thing was that I didn't find the demonstrative reason for its non ex-sistence. I simply failed.

The fact that I'm unable to show that the knot of four trefoil knots ex-sists, as a Borromean knot, doesn't prove anything. I would have to demonstrate that it cannot ex-sist, whereby, in that very impossibility, a real would have been secured. It would be a real constituted by the fact that there is no Borromean knot that is constituted of four trefoil knots. To demonstrate this would be to reach a real.

To tell you what I think about it, still in my way of saying that this is my ponder, I believe that this knot ex-sists. I mean that this is not the path by which we would stumble upon a real.

So, I do not despair of finding it, but it's a fact that I'm unable to show you anything of the like. Here the relationship between showing and demonstrating is sharply divided. If and when it were to be demonstrated, it would be easy to show it to you.

Mme Y. – You said earlier that in Chomsky's perspective language can be an organ, and you spoke about the hand. Why did you use this word hand*? Is there, in this word, a reference to an object that is not yet technological in the Cartesian sense of the term? That is to say, a technology that is unaware of language? Is the hand there to show the necessity of another theory of technology besides Chomsky's theory.*

Yes, in spite of the existence of handshakes, the hand in the act of handshaking knows nothing of the other hand. That's what I claim.

9 December 1975

III

ON THE KNOT AS THE SUBJECT'S SUPPORT

Soury and Thomé
Knot and knot
Personality and paranoia
The sinthome and the unconscious
Meaning and jouissance

If one were to put as much seriousness into analyses as I put into preparing my Seminar, well, that would be so much the better, and would surely bring about better results.

For that, one would have to possess a sentiment of absolute risk in analysis. I have this sentiment, but it's sentimental, as I was saying the other day.

1

The trefoil knot (circular form)

I was speaking to you the other day about the trefoil knot, which I draw like this, and which you can see is obtained from the Borromean knot by joining up the cords at the three points I have just noted. I told you that I had made the discovery that three trefoil knots can be knotted together in a Borromean fashion.

I also told you, by way of explanation, in what way this was absolutely justifiable. I then told you that I had striven for two months to make ex-sist, for this most straightforward of knots, a four-component Borromean knot. Lastly, I told you that the fact that I didn't manage to make it ex-sist doesn't prove anything, except my clumsiness. I recall having said by way of conclusion that I believed this knot ought indeed to exist.

That very same evening – it was late, because I'd got out a bit later than usual in view of my obligations – I had the pleasant surprise of finding on my doorstep a certain Thomé, to cite him by name, who had come to bring me – for which I thanked him extensively – the proof, the fruit of his collaboration with Soury, that the Borromean knot of four trefoil knots does indeed exist.

Soury and Thomé. Make a mental note of these names.

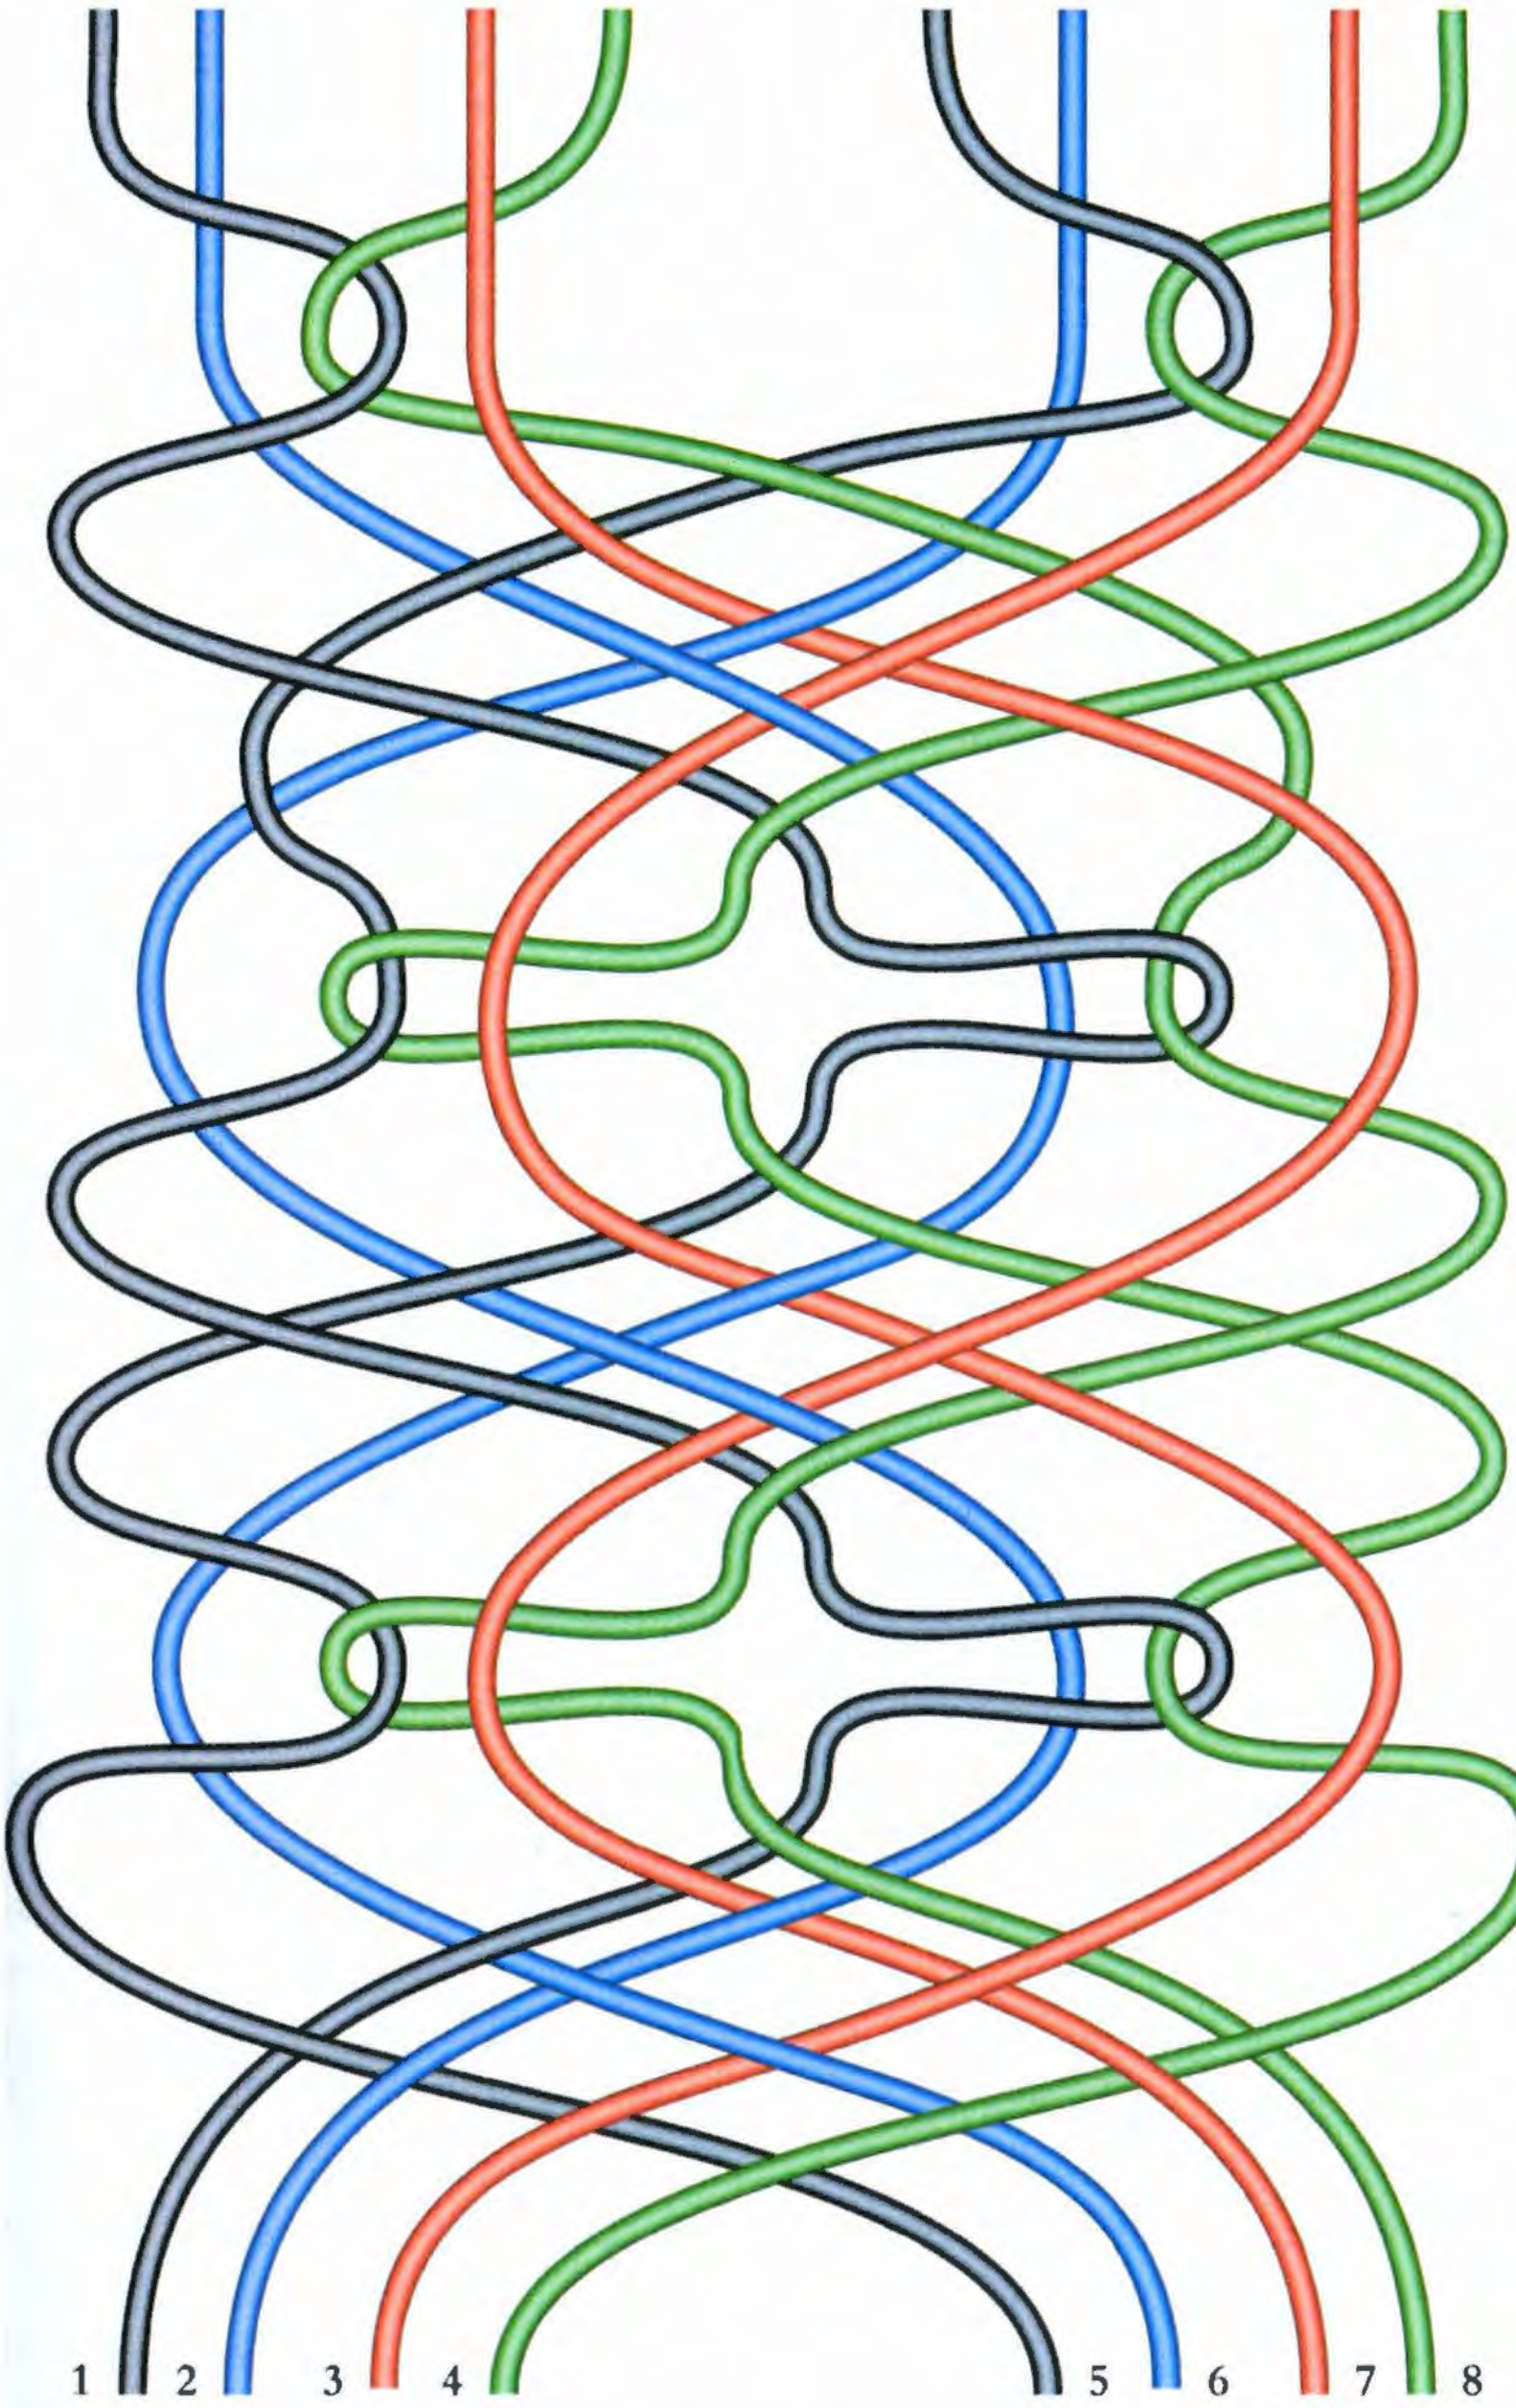
This most certainly justifies my obstinacy, but does not make my incapacity any the less deplorable. Still, I did not welcome the news that this problem had been solved with mixed feelings – a mixture of regret at my powerlessness and satisfaction that success had been achieved. My feelings were of sheer enthusiasm, and I think I displayed some of this when I saw them a few evenings later.

They weren't able to give me an account of how they'd found it. They found it de facto, and I hope I haven't made any mistakes in transcribing the fruit of their discovery on this sheet of paper up here in the middle of the blackboard. I've reproduced what they developed – with only some slight changes – textuellement, which is the fitting expression here. The planar diagram of the pathways is just slightly different. I'm presenting it to you in this form so that you can sense how it's put together perhaps a little better than you can in the figure they produced.

From the angle of this figuration[1], you can all see that, were the black trefoil knot to be elided, the three other trefoil knots would clearly be roaming free. In effect, since the green trefoil knot lies under the red trefoil knot, you would just have to bring the green one away from the red for the blue trefoil knot to show itself to be free as well.

I spent a long time with Soury and Thomé. They didn't confide how they came to obtain this knot. Besides, I don't think that there is only one way, that there is only this way. Perhaps next time I'll show you how you can obtain it in another way.

Before I tell you why I went in search of this knot, I would like to commemorate a little further this minor event, which moreover I do not consider to be minor.

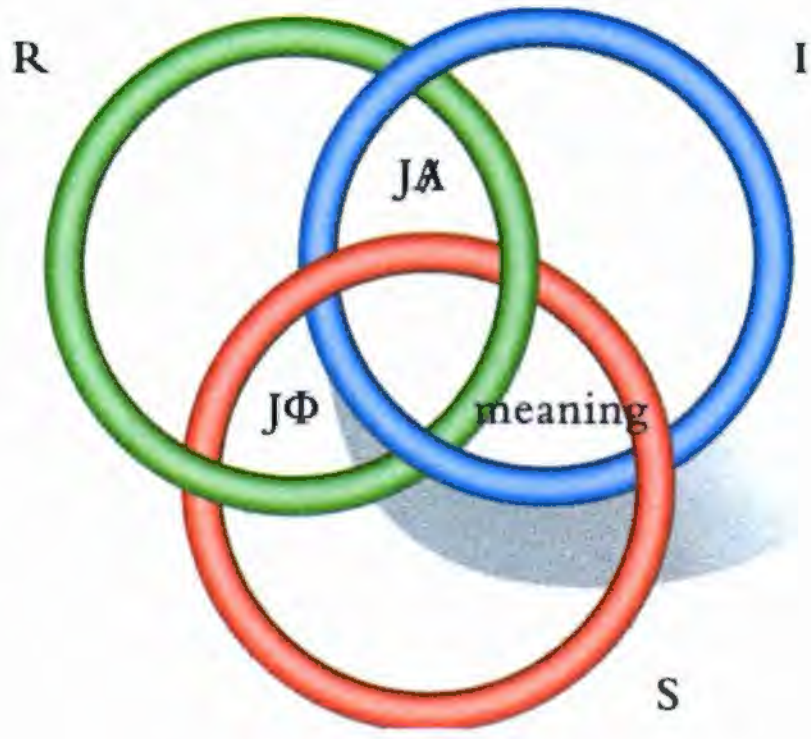


The Borromean link of four trefoil knots

I don't believe the support of this research to be the uncanny that Sarah Kofman looks at in a remarkable article that she has titled Vautour rouge. This support is none other than a reference to The Devil's Elixirs that Freud lauded, which is a reference she's citing anew, having already mentioned it once in her Quatre romans analytiques, an entire book she authored. The article, meanwhile, features alongside those of five other contributors in a collection called Mimesis, which really is worth reading. Truth be told, I've only read the first, third, and fifth articles, because I've had other fish to fry in preparing this Seminar. The first article, which is about Wittgenstein and all the fuss to which his teaching has given rise, is altogether remarkable. I read that one from beginning to end.

The uncanny incontestably pertains to the imaginary. The altogether specific and original geometry of knots has the effect of exorcizing this uncanny, but that there should be something that enables it to be exorcized is surely uncanny in itself.

Where should I place what is at issue here? To specify it for you on the diagram that I gave you last year, it is round about here.



RSI Diagram

Here, the imaginary opens out across two circles, which can also be noted as a drawing. I would say that a drawing doesn't note anything, in so far as the planar diagram remains enigmatic. Nevertheless, I'm indicating here, at the join with the imaginary of the body, something along the lines of a specific inhibition that would be typified by the uncanny in particular. This is where I will allow myself to note, at least provisionally, the place of the said uncanny.

The resistance that imagination feels when cogitating what is involved in this new geometry is something that has struck me on account of having experienced it myself. I daresay, even though they haven't told me about it, that Soury and Thomé have been particularly captivated by what in my teaching has led me to explore the knot, and which was even pressed upon me under the influence of the conjunction between the imaginary, the symbolic, and the real. It is certainly not by chance that they have been caught by this flight of fancy of mine. Let's say that they are gifted for this sort of thing.

What is odd – and this time I will allow myself to betray what they confided in me – is that they make their way through this by speaking to each other. I found that quite striking, given what you know I say about dialogue. I didn't mention this to them straightaway because, truth be told, what they confided struck me as something exceedingly precious. It's quite certain that we don't usually ponder in twos.

The fact is, however, that it is by speaking to each other that they've been getting results that are remarkable not only in view of this latest success, because for a long time now what they have been composing on Borromean knots has struck me as holding considerable interest. This latest discovery will surely not be the crowning achievement of their labour, for they will make further discoveries. I won't add what Soury in particular told me about how he thinks about my teaching. This is an affair in which, following my example, the example I qualified earlier, he will doubtless acquit himself just as well as I can, that is to say, in the same suggestive way.

The fact that a discovery such as this can be achieved through dialogue – though I don't know if this was especially the case on this occasion – the fact that dialogue has proven to be especially fruitful in this domain, confirms that I missed out on it. I mean that, for those two months during which I was toiling away at finding the fourth trefoil knot and the way that it could be knotted to the three others in Borromean fashion, I was most certainly labouring away on my own, pinning my hopes on my cogitation.

Never mind. I'm not going to insist. It's time to say in what way this research was important to me.

2

This research was of the utmost importance for me for the following reason.

The three circles of the Borromean knot are, as circles, equivalent to one another. They are constituted by something that is reproduced in all three of them. Whatever happens, don't lose sight of this fact.

It is not by chance, indeed it is the result of a certain concentration, that I place in the imaginary the support of what makes for consistency. I likewise make the hole the essential part of what is involved in the symbolic, and I give a special support to the real in what I have been calling ex-sistence.

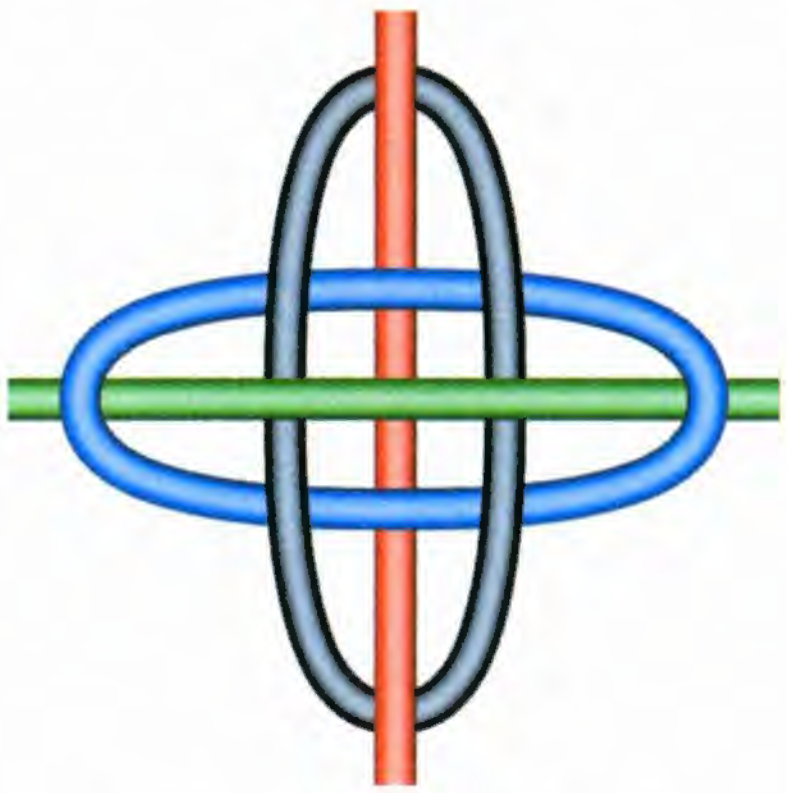
The fact that the first two are loose from one other – this is the very definition of the Borromean knot – enables me to sustain the ex-sistence of the third, that of the real, in relation to the free-roaming imaginary and symbolic. In sisting outside the imaginary and the symbolic, the real butts into, plays into, something that is of the order of limitation. Once it has been tied to the other two in Borromean fashion, from that moment forth the two others resist it. This is a way of saying that the real only enjoys ex-sistence to the extent that it encounters, with the symbolic and the imaginary, a point of arrest.

Of course, my formulating it in this way is not mere chance, but it's still rather astonishing, because you have to say the same of the other two. It is also inasmuch as it ex-sists relative to the real that the imaginary encounters friction, though in this case it is more easily perceived. Why then do I put this ex-sistence precisely right where it might seem to be most paradoxical? It is because I have to share out these three modes, and it is precisely on account of ex-sisting that pondering the real is sustained.

But what results from this, if not that we have to conceive of these three terms as being joined onto one another? If they are so – to employ this term – analogous, then can we not suppose that this is because of some continuity? There you have it for what leads us directly to fashioning the trefoil knot. Indeed, given the way that these three balance each other out, the way that they superpose one over the other, it doesn't take a great deal of effort to join up the points in the planar diagram, thus turning them into a continuity.

What is it that results from this, such that from this knot something that really has to be said to belong to the order of the subject – in so far as the subject is only ever supposed – finds itself supported in the trefoil knot? That is to say, if the trefoil knot is itself tied together in a Borromean fashion – with at least three – does that suffice? My question concerned precisely this point.

Does it not emerge that the minimum requirement in a Borromean link is invariably constituted by a four-component knot?

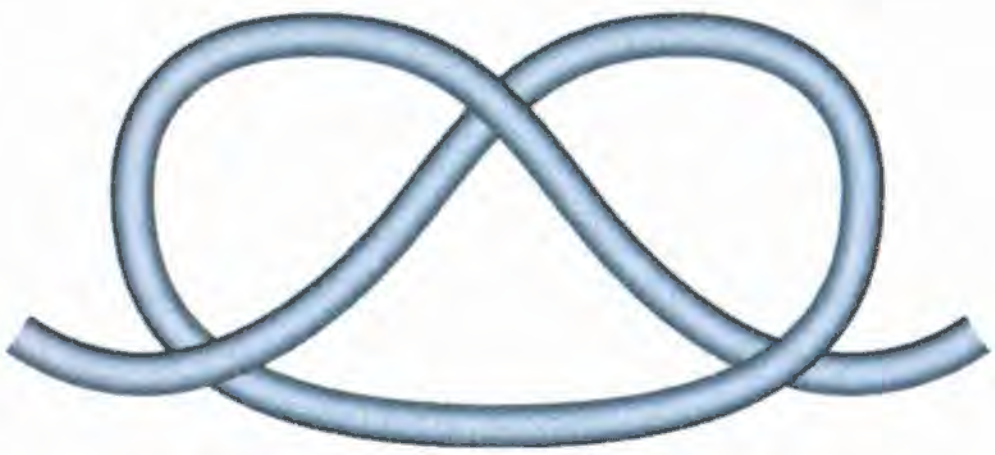


Borromean relation of 1 to 3

I mean that you just have to tug on this green cord to notice that the black circle, which is here knotted round the red cord, will take on the palpable shape of a Borromean link in being pulled by the blue circle.

Indeed, it seems that the least one may expect from the Borromean link is this relation of 1 to 3 others.

Now, we already have the proof that four trefoil knots, like this one – because this one, even though it is presented in an open form, is no less of a trefoil knot – can be composed together in a Borromean fashion, one in relation to the others.



Open form of the trefoil knot

We then get the following. It is invariably on the basis of three supports, which for our purposes we shall call subjective supports, that is, personal supports, that a fourth term will be propped up. If you care to think back to the way I introduced this fourth element with respect to the three elements that are each supposed to constitute something personal, the fourth will be what I am announcing this year as the sinthome.

It is not for nothing that I have written up these items in a particular order, namely, RSI, SIR, and IRS. It was precisely to this that my title from last year corresponded, RSI.

R S I
S I R
I R S

sinthome

The 3 + 1 scheme

3

The same Soury and Thomé have shown that once the Borromean knot has been given colour and orientation there are two knots of a different nature.

This duality of the Borromean knot, to which I have already expressly alluded in this Seminar, can already be shown in the planar diagram.

I'm summarizing here. I'm just indicating in which direction it can be put to the test.

I've told you about the equivalence between the three rings of string. It is remarkable that what is effective when it comes to orienting them is that their difference should be marked out by colours, as opposed to marking out their identity. To mark out their identity would involve labelling them with an initial letter. Thus, to say R, I, and S, is already to give each of them as such the titles of the real, the symbolic and the imaginary.

What is marked out by colour is not the difference of each one from the next, but rather their absolute difference, as it were, in so far as it is a difference common to all three of them. It is only when something is introduced to mark out the difference between the three of them, as opposed to difference at the level of the twain, that there appears as a consequence the distinction between two structures of the Borromean knot.

Which of these two knots is the true one with regard to what is at stake in the way that the imaginary, the symbolic, and the real tie together in what supports the subject? This is a question that deserves to be examined. To appreciate this, you should refer to my previous allusions to the duality of the Borromean knot, since today I have only been able to mention it very briefly.

There is something that is quite remarkable, namely, that when one considers instead the trefoil knot, it bears no trace of this difference. In the trefoil knot, that is to say, in the fact that we put the imaginary, the symbolic, and the real in continuity, it is not surprising that we should see that there is only a single trefoil knot there.

I do hope that there are enough of you taking notes because this is important. Important enough to suggest that you should go and check what is at issue, namely, that when it comes to the trefoil knot, which homogenizes the Borromean knot, there is only one type.

Does this mean that this one type is true? Everyone knows that there are two trefoil knots. It depends on whether the knot is dextrorotary or levorotatory. So, this is a problem I'm going to put to you – what is the bond between these two types of Borromean knot and the two types of trefoil knot?

Either way, if the trefoil knot is indeed the support for any sort of subject, how is it to be examined? How is it to be examined in such a way that it is indeed a subject that is at issue here?

There was a time, before I came to the path of analysis, when I was moving down another path, that of my thesis, De la psychose paranoïaque dans ses rapports, that's how I put it, avec la personnalité. On paranoid psychosis in its relationships with personality. If I resisted the republication of my thesis for so long, it was quite simply because paranoid psychosis and personality as such do not have any relationship, for the simple reason that they are one and the same thing.

In so far as a subject knots together as three, the imaginary, the symbolic, and the real, he is supported only by their continuity. The imaginary, the symbolic, and the real are one and the same consistence, and it is in this that paranoid psychosis consists.

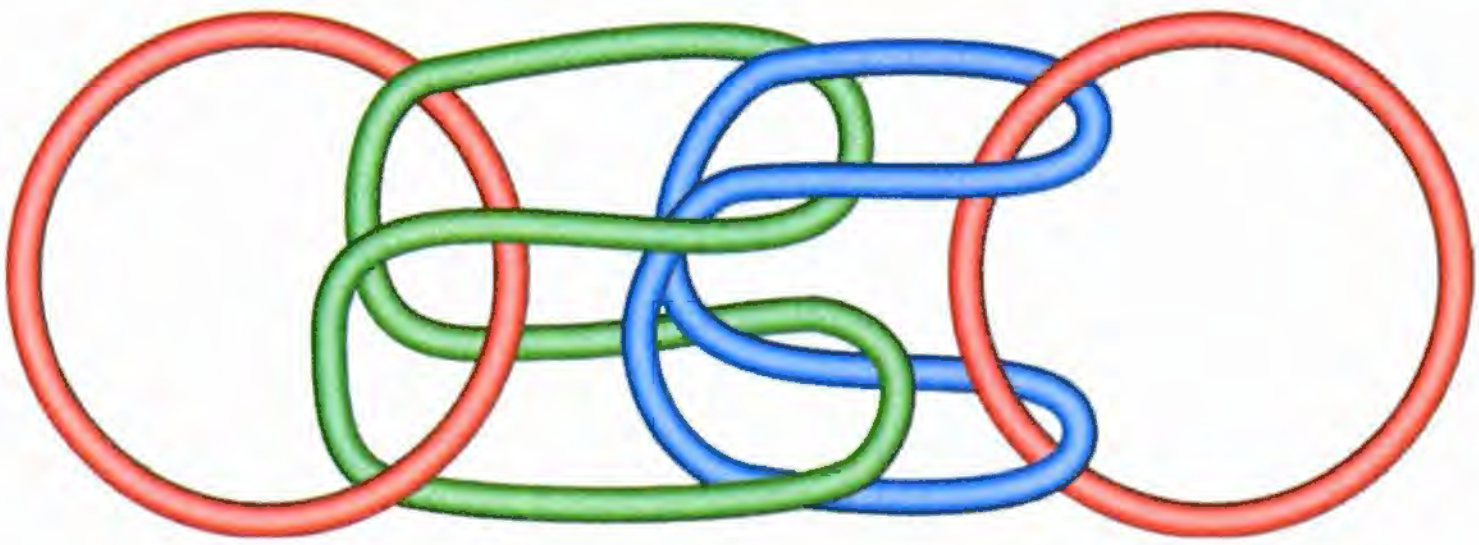
If you hear correctly what I am setting out today, you may deduce from it that to the paranoiac three there can be knotted, in the capacity of a symptom, a fourth term that would be situated as the personality, to the extent that it would be distinct from the three preceding personalities and would be their symptom.

Does this mean that this personality would be paranoiac as well? Nothing indicates this in the case – which is more than probable, which is quite certain – where a Borromean link can be constituted from an indefinite number of trefoil knots. With regard to this link, which from this moment forth no longer constitutes a paranoia unless it be run-of-the-mill paranoia, the possible flocculation, which would be final, of fourth terms in this braid, which is the subjective braid, leaves us with the possibility of supposing that there are certain choice points across the totality of the texture which are found to be the term of the four-component knot. It is precisely in this that the sinthome, strictly speaking, consists.

The sinthome is at issue not as a personality but as that which stands out, with respect to the three others, as a sinthome and as neurotic.

It is in this respect that we are afforded a glimpse of what is involved in the unconscious – in so far as the sinthome specifies it, in so far as there is a term that is attached to it in a more specific way. This term enjoys a privileged relationship with what is involved in the sinthome.

In the diagram I showed you earlier of four trefoil knots tied in Borromean fashion, you can see that the red responds to the blue in a particular way, just as the green responds to the black in a particular way. The same holds for the following diagram of the Borromean knot of four rings.



Two pairs in the four-component Borromean link

Colour, to use the term I used earlier, allows one to distinguish, in this set of four, two pairs that are each composed of red plus another colour. We have a red–green pair on the left and a blue–red pair on the right.

There is a pair inasmuch as there is a link between the sinthome and something particular.

Inasmuch as the sinthome is tied onto the unconscious and the imaginary is tied onto the real, we are dealing with something from which the sinthome emerges.

4

These are the difficult things that I wanted to set out for you today.

They most certainly call for a complement, the complement that will tell you why earlier I was led to give the trefoil knot an open form, which was not the form – a circular shape – in which I initially drew it.

First of all, let's come back to the diagram from last year, in which there are three fields. I have already labelled one of these fields JA, to be read, jouissance of the barred Other. What does that mean?

The three central fields of the RSI diagram

This barred A means that there is no Other of the Other, that is to say, nothing stands in opposition to the symbolic, the locus of the Other as such. Thus, there is no jouissance of the Other because there is no Other of the Other. The result of this is that the jouissance of the Other of the Other is not possible for the simple reason that there is none.

From this it transpires that only the two other terms remain. On the one hand, there is meaning, which is produced at the junction, in the planar diagram, between the circle of the symbolic and the circle of the imaginary. On the other hand, there is the jouissance known as the jouissance of the phallus, in so far as it stems from the relationship between the symbolic and the real.

In and of itself, this so-called phallic jouissance is certainly not penile jouissance.

If we consider what arises in relation to the imaginary, that is, the jouissance of the double, of the specular image, the jouissance of the imaginary body, this imaginary body sustains a certain number of gaps and these gaps constitute the different objects that occupy it. So-called phallic jouissance is, however, located here at the conjunction between the symbolic and the real. This is so to the extent that, in the subject who is supported by the parlêtre, which is what I denote as the unconscious, we find might, which is called upon and sustained to conjoin a certain jouissance that, due to the fact of this very speech, conjoins with so-called phallic jouissance.

Phallic jouissance is experienced, given the fact of the parlêtre, as parasitic.

I am writing this phallic jouissance here, thus balancing out what is involved in meaning. This is the locus of that which in consciousness is denoted by the parlêtre as might.

Meaning–jouissance diagram

I'm coming to a close with something that earlier I suggested you read.

There is mimesis in the fact that the three rings partake of the imaginary as consistence, of the symbolic as a hole, and of the real as ex-sisting relative to them. Thus, the three rings mimic one another.

Only, it is all the more difficult to do so because they do not mimic one another simply, but, given the fact of what gets said, they come to be composed in a triple knot. Hence my concern that, having made the discovery that this triple knot is indeed tied, threefold, in Borromean fashion, should the three have remained loose from one another, then a triple knot, playing out across a full application of its texture, ex-sists, which is well and truly a fourth.

It is called the sinthome.

16 December 1975

THE JOYCE TRAIL

IV

JOYCE AND THE FOX RIDDLE

Home truths ticking over
The real bears no meaning Mentality and the adoration of the body
Joyce deep-rooted in the father he disowns
Making a splice between sinthome and jouissance

One is only responsible within the limits of one's savoir-faire.

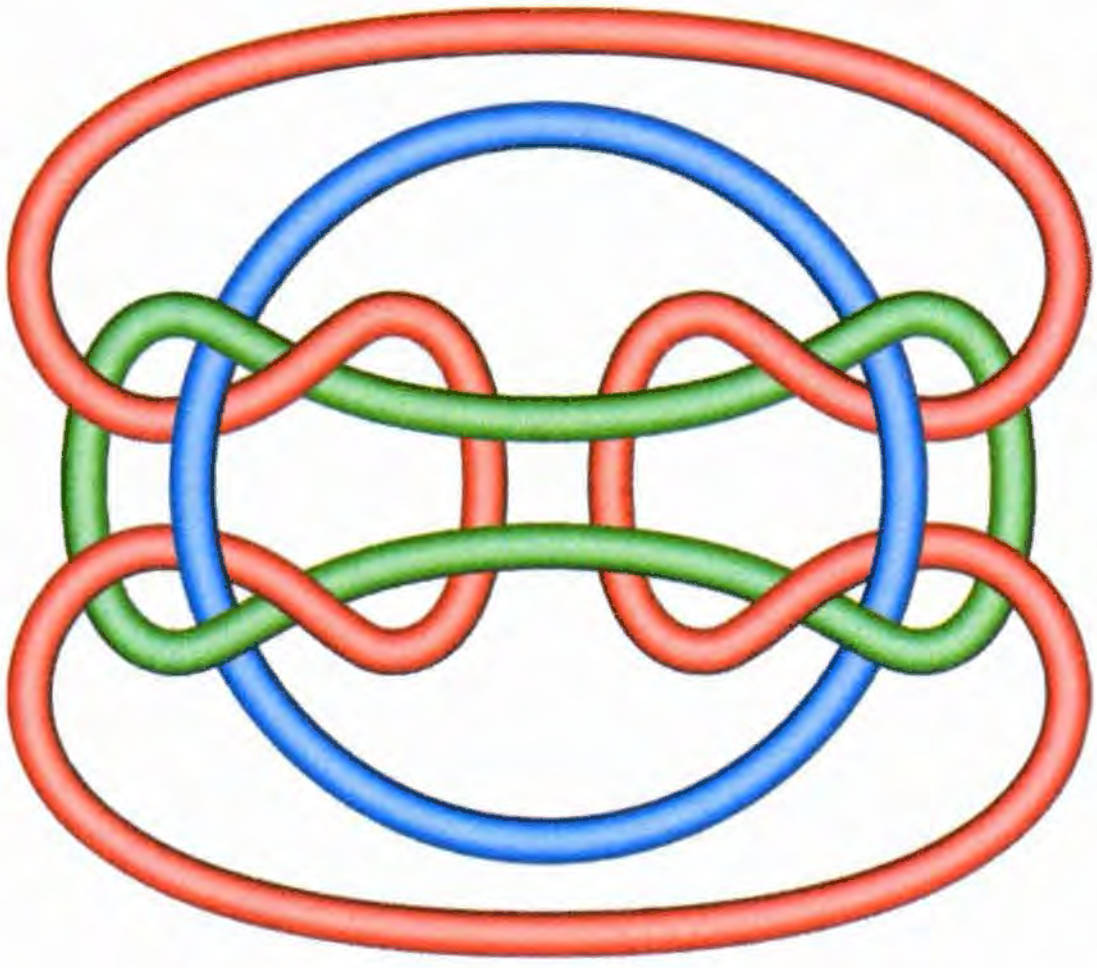
What is savoir-faire? It is art, artifice, that which endues a remarkable quality to the art of which one is capable, because there is no Other of the Other to perform the Last Judgement. At least, so say I.

This means that there is something from which we cannot derive jouissance. Let's call it God's jouissance, with the meaning of sexual jouissance that this embraces.

Does the image that we form of God imply, or not, that He derives jouissance from what He has made? Assuming He ex-sists. Replying that He doesn't ex-sist settles the question by putting the onus on us with respect to a pondering whose essence is to be inserted into the reality, the limited reality, that is attested through the ex-sistence of sex. This reality is a first approximation of the word real, which carries a different meaning in my vocabulary.

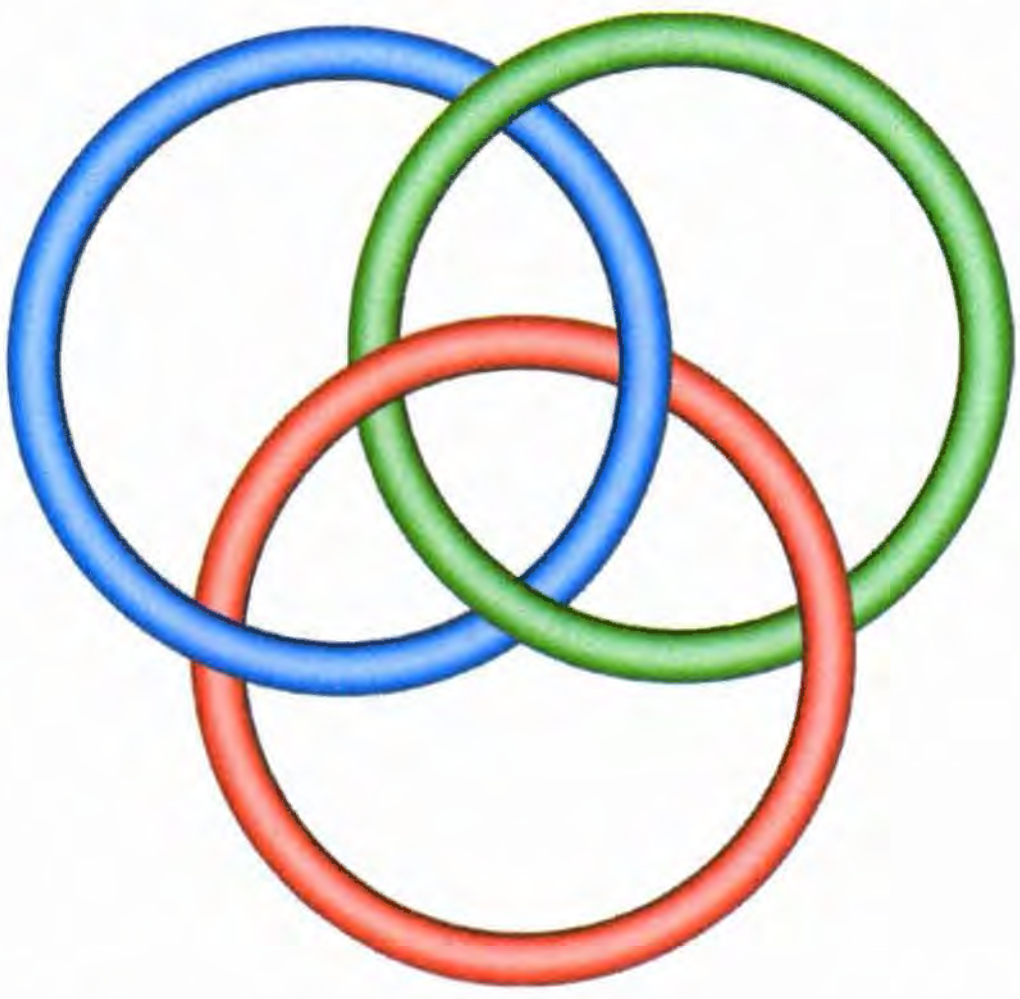
There you go. This is one of the items that I'm bringing you at the start of this new year. These items are what I would call home truths.

That's not such a bad thing for a new year. Not that I haven't been labouring away over the break since we last met some three weeks ago now. I've been working on a few things, a sample of which you can see up here on the blackboard.



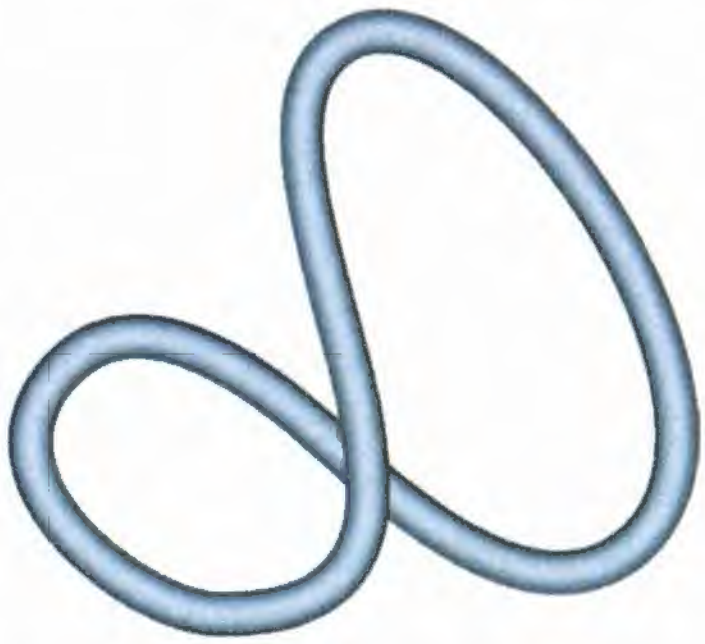
New figuration of a Borromean link

This, as you can see, is a Borromean knot.[1] It is no less of one than the one I usually draw, and which is put together as follows.



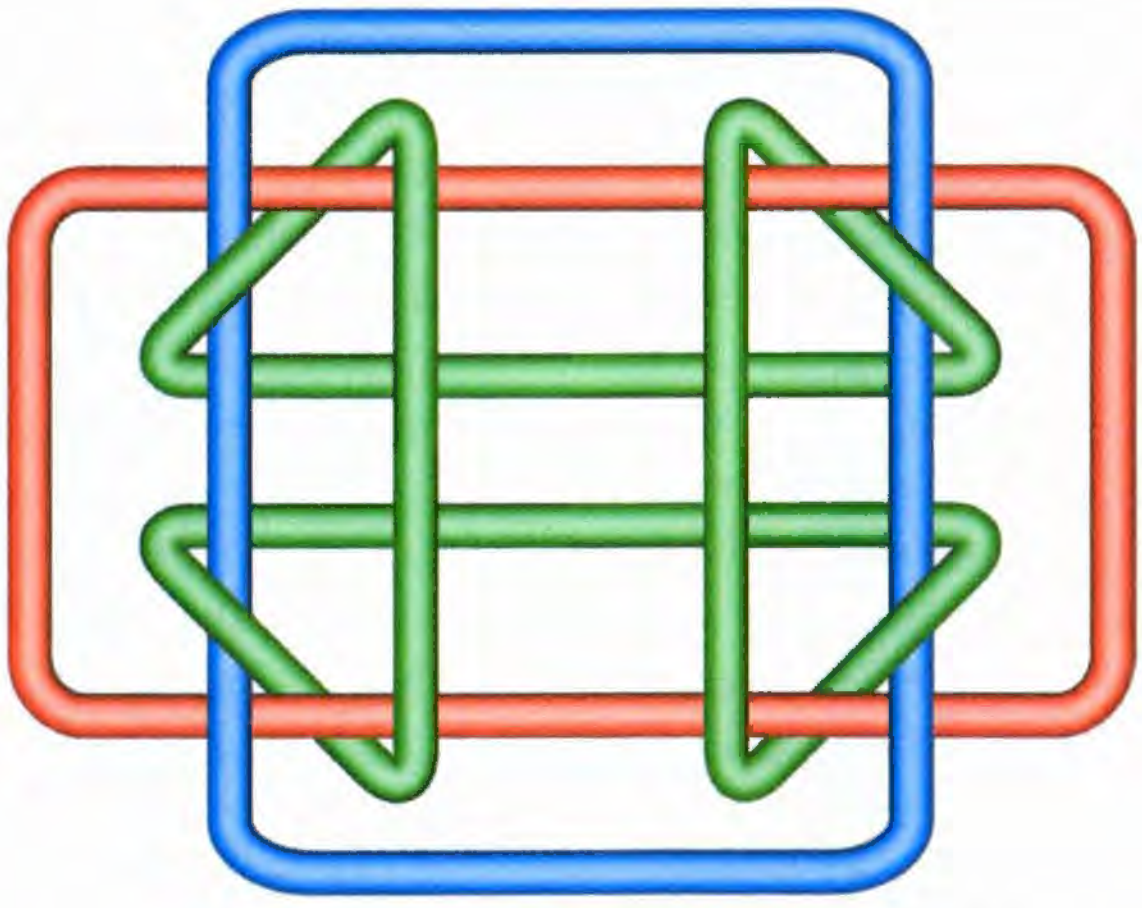
Usual figuration of the Borromean link

The first only differs from the second on account of one thing, which is by no means negligible, namely that this second one can be stretched out in such a way that there is a ring at each of the two extremities, with the one in the middle forming the join.



Figuration of the middle ring

The difference is this. Suppose if you will that three elements like this middle ring come together in a circular way. You can see, I hope, how this can be made without me having to trace it out for you on the board. This can be simplified like the one that I traced out first, or else as follows. This is the same knot.[2]



Another figuration of a Borromean link

Naturally, I wouldn't make do with this alone. I spent my holidays dreaming up a good many more of these in the hope of finding one good one that would serve as an easy support for what I've started to tell you today by way of home truths.

Well, and here's the surprising thing, this doesn't happen all on its own. Not that I think I'm wrong to have found in the knot the support of our consistence. Only, this is already a sign that I can deduce this knot only from a link, namely, something that is not at all of the same nature. A link is not the same thing as a knot.

Let's get back, though, to the ticking over of these truths that I've called home truths.

It is clear that the very first stirrings of what is called pondering, of what makes sense, from the moment it first rears its head, entails a reference, a gravitation towards the sexual act, however little in evidence this act may be. The very word act implies an active / passive polarity, which already puts us on the path to the wrong meaning. This is what is called cognizance, with the ambiguity that what is active is that of which we take cognizance, though we imagine ourselves to be active in making the effort to take cognizance.

Therefore, from the very start, cognizance shows itself for what it is – deceptive. This is precisely why everything needs to be begun again from scratch, starting off from sexual opacity. I'm saying opacity because, first of all, we fail to realize that no relation of any sort ever comes to be founded on the basis of the sexual.

This implies, as pondering dictates, that, in the sense that responsibility means non-response, or a response that falls wide of the mark, the only responsibility that exists is sexual responsibility. At the end of the day everyone has an inkling of this.

On the other hand, what I have called savoir-faire goes much further, and to this is added the artifice that we impute to God. This imputation is quite needless, as Joyce insists, because this is something that titillated him in some locality, which is what we call pondering.

God is not the one who made this thing that we call the universe. People impute to God what is the artist's business, the first model of which is the potter, as everybody knows. It is said that he moulded – but with what, though? – this thing that is called, not by chance, the universe. Universe means but one thing, that there is Oneness, Yad'lun,[3] but we don't know where. It is more than unlikely that this One constitutes the universe.

The real Other of the Other, that is, the impossible, is the idea that we form of artifice, inasmuch as it is a form of making which eludes our grasp, that is, which far exceeds the jouissance we can derive from it. This altogether slender jouissance is what we call esprit.[4]

All of this implies a notion of the real. Of course, we have to make it distinct from the symbolic and the imaginary. The only onerous factor – this really is the fitting expression, and you'll be seeing why later – is that, in this affair, the real makes sense, when in actual fact, if you look more deeply into what I mean by this notion of the real, it appears that the real is grounded in that it bears no meaning, in that it excludes meaning, or, more accurately, in that it settles in a deposit on account of being excluded from meaning.

I'm telling you this as I think it. So that you should know this, I'm telling you.

What is imagined, in its form that is most devoid of meaning, is consistency. Nothing forces us to imagine consistency, would you believe it.

I have here a book by a certain Robert Martin Adams called Surface and Symbol. It is a study – without the subtitle, how would we know? – on The Consistency of James Joyce's Ulysses. Here we have something like an intuiting of the distinction between the imaginary and the symbolic. As proof of this there is a whole chapter that places a question mark at the end of the title, Surface or Symbol?

What is meant by consistency here? It means what holds together, and this is precisely why on this occasion it is symbolized by the surface. Indeed, poor things that we are, we only get any idea of consistency from that which forms a bag, or from sackcloth. This is the first idea we have. Even the body is something we feel to be a skin that holds a heap of organs in its bag. In other words, this consistency is threadbare to the point of showing the cord. Our capacity for imaginative abstraction is so weak, however, that the knot is excluded from the cord, the cord that shows through as a residue of consistence.

Now, it is on this point that I can perhaps bring in the only tuppence ha'penny worth for which, when all is said and done, I acknowledge my responsibility – in a cord, the knot is all that ex-sists, in the proper sense of the term.

It is not for nothing, I mean, it is not without a hidden cause, that I've had to prepare an inroad to this knot by beginning with the link, in which there are elements that are distinct. These elements consist in some form of the cord, either as a straight line that we have to suppose to be infinite so that the knot doesn't come undone, or else in what I've been calling a ring of string, in other words a cord that is joined to itself with a splice.

The knot does not constitute the cord's consistence. Consistence still needs to be distinguished from the knot. The knot ex-sists relative to the cord element, relative to the consistent cord.

Therefore, a knot can be fashioned. This is precisely why I've been progressing through these elementary forms of join. I've proceeded in this way because it seemed to me that it was the most didactic way, given that mentality – there's no need to say any more – the senti-mentality specific to the parlêtre – because he senses it, he feels its burden – ment-ality to the extent that he is mendacious, is a fact.

What is a fact? It's precisely his doing. There is only any fact due to the fact that the parlêtre says it. There are no other facts besides those that the parlêtre recognizes as such by saying them. There is no fact but by dint of artifice. And it is a fact that he lies, that is, that he establishes false facts and acknowledges them, because he possesses mentality, that is, self-love.

Self-love is the principle of imagination. The parlêtre adores his body because he believes that he has it. In reality, he doesn't, but his body is his only consistency – his only mental consistency, you understand – because his body will clear off at any moment. It is even fairly miraculous that it subsists for the time it is being used, which is an inescapable fact, due to the fact of saying it. It is inescapable inasmuch as, however you use it, it won't get used up.

This is a fact that can be observed even in animals. The body doesn't evaporate. It is consistent. Indeed, this is what is disagreeable to mentality, solely because this mentality believes in having a body to adore. There lies the root of the imaginary. Je le panse, I put a dressing on it, that is, je le fais panse, I turn it into a paunch, therefore, je l'essuie, I suffer it.[5] It comes down to that. The sexual is what is mendacious in all this, sounding off a bit much as it does.

This is for want of the imaginary abstraction I mentioned earlier, the abstraction that is reduced to consistency, because the only concrete dimension we know is always sexual adoration, that is to say, la méprise, getting it wrong, in other words, le mépris, contempt, because what one adores is not supposed to have any mentality, cf. the case of God.

This is true only for the body considered as such – I mean, adored, because adoration is the only relationship that the parlêtre has with his body – to the point that whenever he adores another one, another body, it's invariably suspicious because it entails the same contempt – the same veritable contempt, since this has to do with verity.

What is truth? as someone once asked. What does it mean to speak the truth about the truth, which is what I was reproached for not saying throughout the period when I was first spouting my twaddle?

It means to do what I have effectively done, and nothing more – to track the real, which consists, which ex-sists, only in the knot.

2

A function of haste. I must make haste.

Naturally, I shan't get to the end of it, even though I haven't been idling, but to bring the knot to a close imprudently simply means to go a bit quickly.

The knot that I made for you at the start in two different forms is perhaps a tad insufficient. This was even why I looked for a few others in which there might be a higher crossing number than there is here. But let's stick to the principle, the principle that, all things considered, we need to make sure we have found.

I was led to this principle by sexual relation, that is, by hysteria, in so far as it is the last perceptible reality, the last, ὕστερον, with respect to what is at issue in sexual relation. Freud saw this very clearly. That's where he learnt the ABC behind it, which didn't stop him from asking the question Was will das Weib? –

W w d W.

He made just one mistake. He thought that there was das Weib. There is only ein Weib –

W w e W.

All the same, I'm about to give you a little something to get your teeth into. I should like to illustrate this with something that forms a support, and which is very much what is at issue in this question.

Some time ago, I spoke about the énigme. I wrote it with a capital E followed by a lowercase e in subscript – E_e. This has to do with Enunciation and the énoncé, the statement. A riddle, as the name indicates, is an enunciation such that its statement cannot be found.

You'll find one of these riddles pointed out in the book I mentioned earlier, Surface and Symbol. Since it is published by Oxford University Press, it's easier to find than the famous A Portrait of the Artist as a Young Man, which you can nevertheless get hold of provided you don't insist on having the edition that includes all the criticism that Chester Anderson took care to tack on at the end. So, here, in this R. M. Adams volume, you will find something that holds great worth.

In the first chapters of Ulysses, Stephen goes off to teach one of those little groups of people that constitutes a class, in Trinity College, if I remember rightly. Stephen is the Joyce that Joyce dreams up. And since Joyce is no fool, he doesn't adore him, far from it. He just has to mention Stephen and he breaks out in a snigger. This is not far removed from my stance when I speak to you about myself, or in any case about my prate to you.

Of what, then, do riddles consist? Riddling is an art that I shall call an art between the lines, thereby alluding to the cord. I don't see why the lines of what is written should not be tied in by a second cord.

With everything that I've managed to consume by way of histories of writing, even theories of writing – there is a certain Février who produced an Histoire de l'écriture, and another, by the name of Gelb, who has done a theory of writing – my mind started wondering.

Writing is of interest to me because I think that it was through little bits of writing that, historically speaking, we entered the real, that is, that we stopped imagining. The real is upheld by writing little mathematical letters. But good heavens, how did that come about? I wondered. It was then that I turned a corner with something that strikes me as, let's say, vraisemblable, plausible, when I told myself that writing must always have something to do with the way that we set down the knot in a written form.

A knot is commonly written like this. Already, this gives us an S.

Beauty according to Hogarth

All the same, this is something that bears a strong relationship with the instance of the letter, such as I uphold it. Then, this produces a body that is vraisemblable with respect to beauty. Hogarth, who examined beauty in great detail, thought that it always had something to do with this double curve. That's poppycock, of course, but in the end it moves in the direction of connecting beauty to something other than obscenity, that is, to the real. Ultimately, the only beauty there is would thus be writing. Why not?

Let's get back to Stephen, whose name also begins with an S.

Stephen is Joyce in so far as he deciphers his own riddle. He doesn't get far because he believes in all his symptoms. This is very striking.

He begins by believing in his race. When it comes to his beginnings, in fact he started long before, sputtering out a few bits and pieces, even poems, and it's not the best stuff he came up with. But my word, he believed in such things as the uncreated conscience of my race. You find that at the end of A Portrait of the Artist as a Young Man. It's plain to see that this doesn't reach very far.

It ends well, though. I'll read you the last sentence of A Portrait of an Artist – you see, I made a slip, because he reckoned himself to be the Artist.

> 27 April: Old father, old artificer, stand me now and ever in good stead.

He addresses this prayer to his father, a father who distinguishes himself precisely as – I dunno – as what we might call an unworthy father, a failing father, the one whom throughout Ulysses he will seek in the guise of he who is not to be found at any level whatsoever.

Clearly there is a father somewhere, and that is Bloom, a father who is trying to find himself a son, but Stephen protests that it's really not for him. After the father I had, I've had my fill. No more father. Especially given that the Bloom in question is not so very tempting.

In the end, however, it's quite peculiar how Bloom's ponderings and Stephen's orbit each other and are pursued throughout the novel, to the point that Adams, whose name oozes more Jewry than Bloom, is very struck by some particular little clues that he discovers.

Singularly, he discovers that it's far too implausible to attribute to Bloom a knowledge of Shakespeare that he plainly doesn't possess. Moreover, this knowledge is not at all necessarily correct, even if it is the knowledge that Stephen possesses. It really is pure supposition because it presumes that Shakespeare had relations with a certain herbalist who lived in the same part of London. Adams stresses that the fact that this occurs to Bloom exceeds the bounds of what may rightly be attributed to him.

In truth, there is a whole chapter of Surface and Symbol that deals strictly with just this, to the point that it culminates in a Blephen – since earlier I made a slip – a Blephen and Stoom that we meet in the text of Ulysses. This clearly shows that they are made not only of the same signifier but truly of the same matter.

Ulysses is the testimony of how Joyce remains deeply rooted in his father while still disowning him. That's precisely what his symptom is.

3

I said that Joyce is the symptom. His entire life's work vouches for this at length.

Exiles is really an approach to something that for him is the core symptom, which is formed from the specific shortcoming of sexual relation. This shortcoming must, however, assume some shape, and it does so not just any old how.

It takes the shape of what tethers him to his wife, to she known as Nora, under whose reign he dreams up Exiles.

It has been translated into French as Les Exilés, the exiled, though it means Les Exils as well. There can be no better term to express non-relation than exile, and all that transpires in Exiles revolves precisely around this non-relation.

Non-relation is the fact that there is really no reason to hold one-woman-among-others to be one's woman. One-woman-among-others is also she who has a relationship with just any old other man. And it is indeed this any old other man that is at issue in the character Joyce conjures up, and for whom, at this point in his life, he knows how to open up the choice of the one-woman in question, who is none other than Nora.

The Portrait, which he was bringing to a close at that time, ends with the uncreated conscience of my race, with respect to which he calls upon the artificer par excellence, who would be his father, when in fact this artificer is he. He is the one who knows, who knows what he has to do. To believe, however, that there is an uncreated conscience of any race is a great illusion.

He also believes that there is a book of himself. What an idea! To make oneself be a book! Really, such a thing can only occur to a stunted poet, a confounded poet. Why doesn't he say that he's a knot instead?

Let's come to Ulysses, so that we may analyse it, for this is what a certain Shechner has surely achieved. As I was dreaming, I thought his name was Checher, which is easier to spell, but no, he's called Shechner. It's a shame, because he's not in the least bit séché, he's not a dry fellow. He imagines himself to be an analyst because he's read a lot of analytic books. This is a fairly widespread illusion, among analysts, precisely. And then, he has analysed Ulysses.

Unlike Surface and Symbol, this analysis of Ulysses, which naturally is an exhaustive one – because when you analyse a book you can't really stop, can you? – makes an altogether terrifying impression. On this score, Freud only wrote articles, and limited articles at that. Besides, apart from Dostoyevsky, he never analysed a novel in the strict sense. He made a brief allusion to Ibsen's Rosmersholm, but ultimately he contained himself.

It really does suggest that the novelist's imagination, I mean the one that rules in Ulysses, ought to be tossed into the bin. This really isn't my sense, though. Still, one must press oneself to gather up from Ulysses a few home truths. That's what I was broaching by means of the riddle.

This is what dear Joyce, in the guise of Stephen, offers to his pupils as a riddle. It's an enunciation.

The cock crew,
The sky was blue:
The bells in heaven
Were striking eleven.
'Tis time for this poor soul
To go to heaven

I'll give you three guesses to find what unlocks it. Joyce provides the key once the whole class has fallen silent – The fox burying his grandmother under a hollybush.

That doesn't sound like much at all. Alongside the coherence of the enunciation – which, I point out to you, is in verse, it's a poem in consecutive sequence, and it's a creation – it is incontestable that this little fox burying his grandmother under a bush is truly a wretched thing. But what kind of echo might this have, I shan't say for everyone in this room, but for those of you here who are analysts?

That's what analysis is. It's the response to a riddle. Moreover, it's a response – it has to be said, from this example – that is quite especially daft. This is precisely why one must keep a firm hold on the rope. I mean that, if one has no idea where the rope ends, namely, in the knot of sexual non-relation, one runs the risk of floundering.

Meaning emanates from a field that lies between the imaginary and the symbolic. That goes without saying. I'll have to show you this. Of course, here in the middle is the a, the cause of desire.

RSI diagram

If we think that there is no Other of the Other, or at the very least, no jouissance of this Other of the Other, then we really need to perform a suture somewhere between this symbolic, which stretches out here on its own, and this imaginary, which is here. It is a splice between the imaginary and unconscious knowledge. All of this is done to obtain a meaning, which is the object of the analyst's response to what the analysand exposes at length through his symptom.

When we perform this splice, by the same stroke we make another one, precisely between that which is symbolic and the real. That is to say, in one way or another we teach the analysand to splice, to perform a splice between his sinthome and the parasitic real of jouissance. This is what typifies our operation. To make this jouissance possible is the same thing as what I shall write j'ouïs-sens. It is the same thing as ouïr, hearing, a sens, a meaning.

Splicing the link into a knot
(open form of the trefoil knot)

Analysis is about sutures and splices, but it needs to be said that we should consider the instances as really standing apart. The imaginary, the symbolic, and the real do not get muddled up.

Finding a meaning entails knowing which knot it is, and joining it together fast by means of an artifice. Isn't there something improper about tying a knot by means of what I might call a Borromean linknot?

It is with this question, which I shall leave hanging, that I'm going to leave you. The time has come for us to part.

I haven't left time now for dear Jacques Aubert to speak. My intention was to give him the floor for the rest of the session, but next time, given what I've heard from him, since he was kind enough to call me by phone on Friday, I believe he will be able to tell you about the Bloom in question.

The aforementioned Bloom is no worse placed than any other when it comes to twigging something about analysis, because he's a Jew. The way that he senses the suspension between the sexes means that he cannot help but wonder as to whether he's a father or a mother. Something that certainly radiates out in thousands of different directions in Joyce's text is that, with respect to his wife, Bloom has the sentiments of a mother. He believes that he carries her in his belly. All things considered, one cannot go more terribly astray in what one may feel for someone one loves.

And why not? Love needs to be carefully explained, and to explain it as a kind of madness is the first thing in arm's reach.

I'll leave you on that note. I hope that you haven't been overly disappointed by this first session after the break.

13 January 1976

ADDITIONAL SESSION

The following week: Adjournment to eftsoons

You must see – I assume so, if you're not too backward for it – that I'm in a bind with Joyce, like a fish with a bicycle.

This is clearly linked – I'm able to say so because these days I experience it day in day out – to my lack of practice, let's say, to my inexperience in the language he writes in. Not that I'm completely ignorant in English, but, precisely, Joyce writes English with these peculiar refinements that mean that he disarticulates the tongue, the English tongue on this occasion. Don't imagine that this only begins with Finnegans Wake. Long before, notably in Ulysses, he had a way of chopping up sentences that already inclined that way. It is truly a process that is exerted in the direction of finding another use for the language in which he writes, in any case, a use that is far from ordinary. This is part and parcel of his savoir-faire. I've already cited the article by Sollers in this regard. It would be as well for you to take stock of its pertinence.

The upshot of this is that this morning I'm going to give the floor to someone whose practice goes much further than mine, not only in the English language, but in Joyce in particular. That someone is Jacques Aubert.

So as not to drag on, I'm going to let him speak right away, because he's been good enough to take over from me. I'll be listening to him with all the consideration that I have drawn from his experience of Joyce. The reflections that I shall have to add – quite brief reflections, indeed, because I'm not asking him to shorten his talk, far from it – will, I trust, be added with all the respect that I owe him for having introduced me to what I have called Joyce the Symptom.

So, come up here, dear Jacques. Stand over there. Let's go then.

[Jacques Aubert's presentation is in the appendix, pp. 149–65]

I thank Jacques Aubert for having got his feet wet.

The author of Surface and Symbol, whose name I gave you last time, labels Joyce's art one of inconceivably private jokes. In the same text there appears a word I had to look up in the dictionary, eftsoon. I don't know if this word is a common one. You don't know it? It doesn't ring a bell? It refers to things that are put off till later, after soon. There's nothing but that in Joyce. Not only are the effects put off till later, but more often than not they throw you off track.

Well, that's the art of Jacques Aubert too. He got you to follow one of his threads with bated breath. All of that obviously gives some grounding to what I'm trying to give consistency to in the knot.

I realized that I was already referencing Joyce's slipping and sliding in my Seminar Encore, which rather stunned me. I asked Jacques Aubert whether this wasn't what led him to invite me to speak about Joyce, but he replied that the Seminar hadn't yet been published at the time. So, it can't have been this that incited him to present me with this hole into which I shan't be venturing, no doubt out of some prudence, prudence such as he has just defined it.

The hole of the knot poses me no less of a question.

One is able to ascertain the duplicity of the Borromean knot – which actually is not a knot but a link – I mean, to ascertain that there are two of them, only when the circles, the rings of string, are coloured. I am indebted to Soury and Thomé for mentioning that, which I surely did notice myself, of course.

When the coloured quality distinguishes any one of these rings from the two others, we can, with the aid of this daubing, make it so that there are two knots. If the knots are not coloured, if nothing sets the rings apart, then nor will there be anything to set one knot apart from the other. Both statements will be equivalent.

You will tell me that in the planar diagram there is one that is levorotary and another that is dextrorotary. Here, however, lies the whole crux of this calling into question of the planar diagram. The planar diagram implies a specified viewpoint, and doubtless it is no accident that the notion of left and right cannot be translated into the symbolic in any way whatsoever.

For the knot, this only starts to ex-sist upwards of the three-component relation. How can it be that the three-component relation enjoys this privilege? Precisely here lies that with which I should like to endeavour to solve the question. There must be something here, which cannot be unrelated to the way that Jacques Aubert singled out for us just now the function of phonation, precisely in what is at issue in supporting the signifier.

The keen point, on which I shall remain, is that of knowing where significance qua written starts to be distinct from mere effects of phonation. Phonation is what transmits the proper function of the name, and it is from the proper noun that we shall be setting off again, so I hope, next time we meet.

20 January 1976

V

WAS JOYCE MAD?

The jouissance of the real Redemption or castration
The real within the entanglements of the true
Compensating for a de facto Verwerfung
The value of the proper noun

Things aren't going so well, and I'll tell you why. It's because I've been busy soaking up the vast literature around Joyce's work, to which it has given rise.

Even though the term literature repulsed him, that's still what he gave rise to, and he did so eagerly. He has given rise to a vast amount of waffle. How does such a thing come about?

Jacques Aubert, who is here in the front row, every now and then, and to his credit, sends me up from Lyon hints on a few further authors. He is not innocent in this because he too has produced some stuff on Joyce. But then, who is innocent?

At the leading edge of what is, on this occasion, my labour, this labour of soaking it all up, I have to ask myself why I'm doing it. Plainly it's because I started it, but I'm trying, as one tries with any reflection, to ask myself why I started.

At what point is a person mad? The question is worth asking, but for now the question that I'm posing myself, and which I pose to Jacques Aubert, is the following – was Joyce mad?

1

I won't be answering this question today, which doesn't stop me from starting to try to take my bearings from the formula that I offered you, the distinction between the true and the real.

This is quite obvious in Freud. This is even how he oriented himself – truth is pleasure-giving, which sets it apart from the real. The real does not give pleasure, of course.

It's clear that this is where I've been distorting something in Freud. I've been trying to point out how jouissance partakes of the real.

This leads me into tremendous difficulty, first and foremost because it's clear that the jouissance of the real includes masochism, which Freud noticed. Masochism is the main share of the jouissance endued by the real. Freud discovered that. He didn't foresee it right away, and obviously that's not the first step he took.

It's quite certain that going down that path sucks you in. This is borne out by the fact that I started by writing Écrits inspirés.

That is indeed how I started, and that's why I can't really be all that surprised to find myself grappling with Joyce. This is precisely why I've dared to ask whether Joyce was mad, that is to say, whence his writings came to him through inspiration.

Joyce left behind a large quantity of notes and doodles. Scribbledehobble as a certain Connolly called one Joyce manuscript that he published. I met Connolly in his day, I don't know if he's still around. All in all, the question is this – how are we to find out, based on his notes, what Joyce believed?

It's no accident that he left so much behind. His notes were drafts, and it took the fact that he was eager for this, and even encouraged those we call researchers to hunt them out.

He wrote a large quantity of letters too. Three thick volumes of these have appeared in print. Among them are some that are almost unpublishable. I say almost, because as you can fairly imagine, in the end that's not what would stop someone or other from printing them. The priceless Richard Ellmann has just brought out a last volume, Selected Letters, in which he has published a number of those that were considered unfit for print in the first tome.

There's such a welter that you can make neither head nor tail of it all. At least, I admit that I can't.

I find my way by means of a certain number of little threads, of course. I've managed to form some idea of his doings with Nora, based on my practice, I mean, based on what people confide in me, since I deal with people whom I've trained in such a way that they take pleasure in speaking the truth.

Everyone says, or rather Freud says, that if I manage this, it's because they love me, due to what I've tried to pinpoint in the way of transference, that is, they suppose me to know. Well, it's quite clear that I don't know everything. In particular, on reading Joyce, how are we to know what he believed about himself?

Indeed, the dreadful thing is that I'm reduced to reading him, because surely enough I didn't analyse him, which I regret. Well, clearly he was hardly disposed to it. It came quite naturally to his pen to qualify Freud and Jung as Tweedledum and Tweedledee, which does not show that he was that way inclined.

You must read, if you manage to find the thing, the French translation of A Portrait of the Artist as a Young Man that was published some time ago by La Sirène. Well, I said that you can get the text in English, though you might not get it with what I thought you would get, namely all the criticism and even the notes that have been added. If, however, you can read more easily in the French version what he tells of his prate with a certain Cranly, who is a friend of his, you'll come across a number of things.

It's very striking. Joyce comes to a standstill. He doesn't dare to say what he's getting into. Cranly pushes him and hassles him, pesters him even, to find out whether he is going to follow through on the consequences of his saying that he's lost his faith. This is faith as in the teachings of the Church – the teachings, I say – in which he has been trained. It's clear that he daren't disentangle himself from these teachings because they form, quite simply, the armature of his ponderings. He obviously doesn't manage to take the step of affirming that he no longer believes in them. What is it that makes him recoil from this? Well, the string of consequences that rejecting this vast apparatus would entail, an apparatus that, even so, still forms his support. Read it. It's well worth it. Cranly questions him and implores him to take this step, and Joyce won't.

He writes this down. What he writes is the consequence of what he is, but how far does this go? How far did his means of navigating reach, some of the devices of which he provides – exile, silence, and cunning?

I ask you, Jacques Aubert. Isn't there in Joyce's writings what I shall call the hint that he is, or is turning himself into, what in his language he terms a redeemer? There was one redeemer, a true redeemer, in the fairy tales – to put it the way I see it – that the priests told him, and which he clearly has faith in. Will he go so far as to come in the stead of this redeemer?

I don't see why I shouldn't ask Jacques Aubert for his sense of this, which is worth just as much as mine. We're reduced to sentiment here because Joyce didn't say it, he wrote it, and the whole difference lies there. When one writes, one may indeed touch on the real, but not the true.

So, what do you reckon, Jacques Aubert? Did he believe himself, yes or no?

– There are traces, yes.

That's why I'm asking you, because there are traces.

– In Stephen Hero, there are traces.

Why, yes.

– In the first version, there are very sharp traces.

Listen [to everyone], if you don't understand anything, you can clear the hell out of here. The only thing I ask is for this room to empty. That will mean less bother for me. [To Jacques Aubert] In Stephen Hero, which I have perused a bit, and then in A Portrait of the Artist, what's irritating is that it's never very clear. The artist is not the redeemer, it's God himself, as an artificer.

– Yes, the passages in which he mentions the allure of the illegitimate Christ are also those in which he speaks about the enigma of a manner. And then, on the other hand, this also seems to correspond to the famous period when he was fascinated by Franciscanism, with two aspects that are perhaps of interest, one bearing on the imitation of Christ, which is part of Franciscan ideology, where we are all on the side of the Son, where one imitates the Son, and then the poetry, the Fioretti. One of the texts that he hunts out in Stephen Hero is precisely a text, not by a Franciscan theologian, but a poetic text by Jacopone da Todi.

Exactly. If I ask this question it's because it seemed to me that it was worth asking. How are we to gauge the extent of his belief? With what kind of physics can we operate? Well, with my knots, that's where I'm hoping we have something with which to operate.

2

I've been operating with the knots for want of anywhere else to turn.

I didn't get there straightaway, but they've been affording me things, things that put me in a bind, I must say.

How can I put it? There is a dynamic of the knots. Ça sert à rien, it's pointless, but ça serre, it grips tightly. Well, it can form a tight grip, even if it doesn't have any point. What is it able to grip? Well, something that we suppose to be wedged in by these knots.

If we think that these knots are the most real thing there is, how can there even remain any room for something to be gripped? This is precisely what is supposed by the fact that I'm putting a dot here. It is not unthinkable to see this dot as the reduced notation of a cord that would pass though here and out the other side.

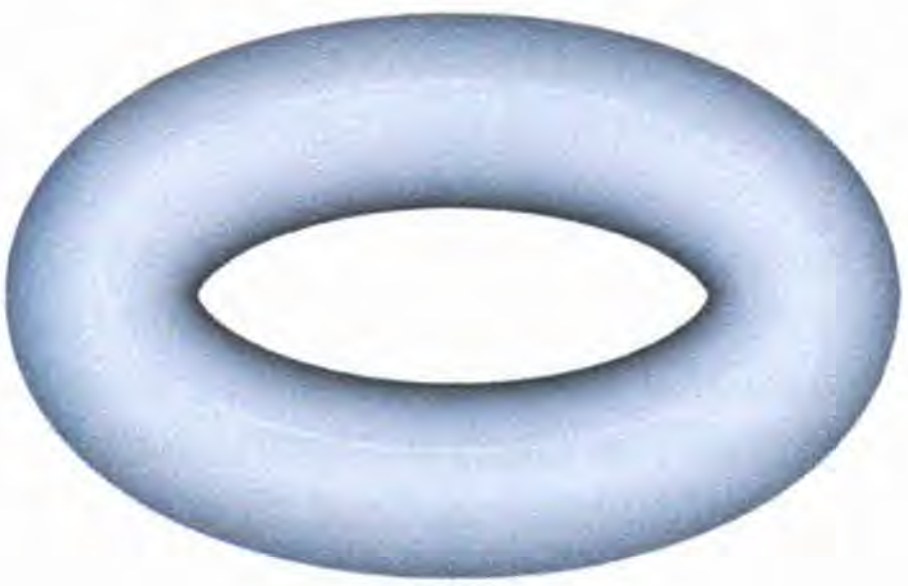
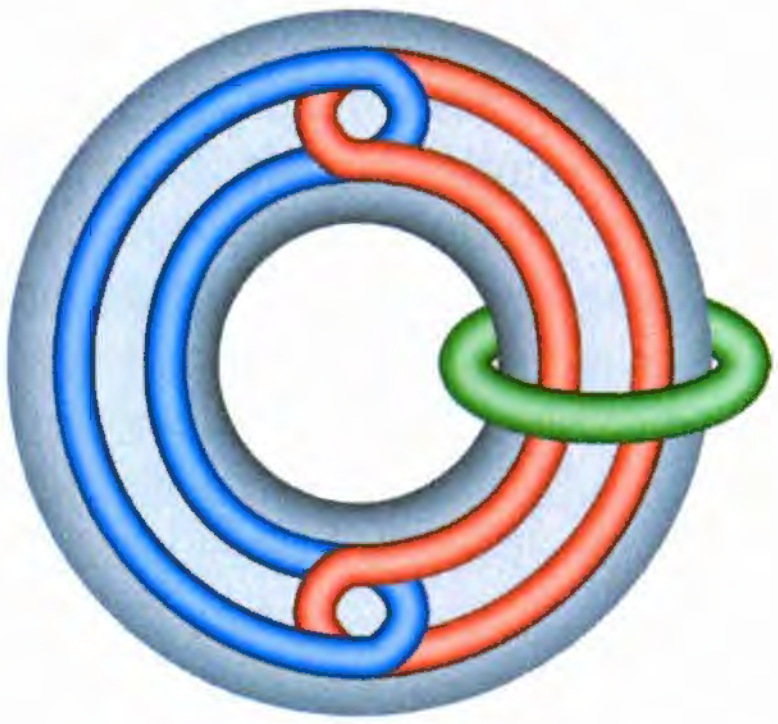
Link with a dot

This business of a cord has the advantage of being just as daft as the representation as a whole, behind which there still lies nothing less than topology. In other words, topology leans on the fact that there is at least this thing – without counting the others that exist – this thing that is known as the torus.



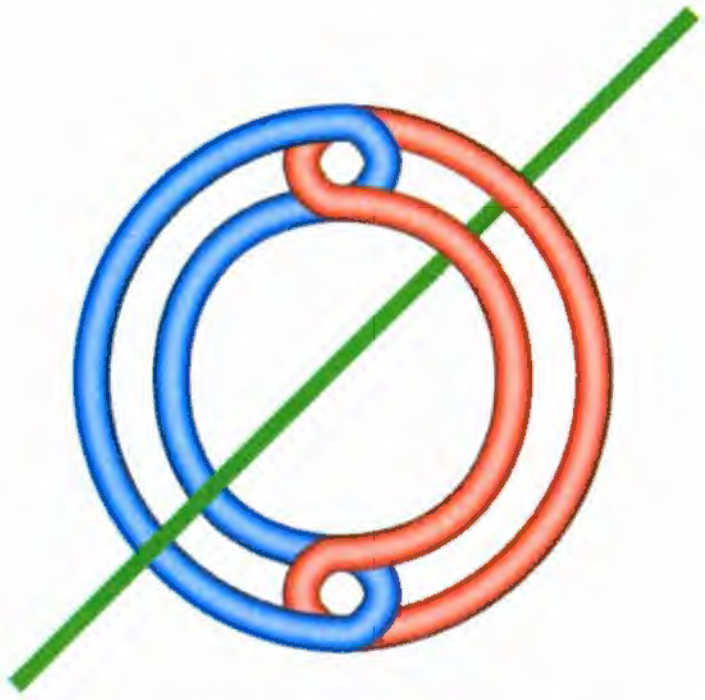
The torus

My good friends Soury and Thomé have succeeded in breaking down the relationships between the Borromean knot and the torus. They realized that the pair of circles that are folded around each other can be set into a torus that is formed thus.



The link set into a torus

For the same reason, if one introduces an infinite straight line – which is not excluded from the problem of the knots, far from it – into what we may term the false hole, it turns it into a true hole. This hole is represented in the planar diagram.



The false hole transformed into a true hole by the addition of an infinite straight line

The question of the planar diagram still remains. In what way is it suitable? The most that we can say is that the knots steer us to this planar diagram as an artifice. In actual fact, this artifice of representation is merely an artifice of perspective, because really we have to supplement this supposed continuity that we can see when the infinite straight line is reckoned to exit – to exit what? Well, the hole.

What function does this hole carry? The hole is something that the most basic experience dictates, the experience of the ring. A ring is not a purely abstract thing like the line of a circle. For a circle to be thinkable, we have to flesh it out, that is, we have to give it consistency. We have to imagine that it is supported by something physical.

Moreover, this is where we meet the following – only the body can be pondered.[1]

3

Let's get back to what we are engaged in today, namely, the Joyce trail.

What do his love letters to Nora imply? There are a certain number of coordinates in them that we need to mark out.

So, what is Joyce's relationship to Nora? Oddly enough, I would say that it's a sexual relation, even though I say that such a thing doesn't exist, but it's a funny old sexual relation.

One thing we ponder, it's agreed, though we seldom ponder it, because it's not customary for us, is to slip our right hand into the left-hand glove by turning it inside out. It's in Kant somewhere, but then, who reads Kant? It's tremendously apposite in Kant. There's just one thing that he didn't think of, perhaps because in his day gloves didn't have a button, and that's the fact that in the inside-out glove, the button is on the inside. All the same, this is an obstacle to the comparison being entirely satisfactory.

If you have carefully followed what I've just said, however, the gloves in question are not entirely arbitrary. The inside-out glove is Nora. It's his way of considering that she fits him like a glove.

It's no accident that I'm advancing by way of this progression. For Joyce, there is but one woman. She follows the same model, always, and he only slips on this glove with the keenest repugnance. It is quite tangible that he made Nora his chosen woman only by virtue of the strongest depreciation. Not only must she fit him like a glove, she must grip him tightly as a glove. She is absolutely pointless.

This is quite plain in their relations, to the point that when they are in Trieste, whenever she drops a sprog – I really am obliged to speak in these terms – it causes a scene. It wasn't part of the programme. Unease sets in between Nora and the one called Jim, who are thick as thieves. People write about him using this name because his wife used it when she wrote to him. With each new rug rat, things go awry between them. Always, in each case, it causes a ~~scene~~.

Just now I spoke about the button. This button must surely be somewhat linked to the way we speak about something, well, an organ. The clitoris, to call it by its name, is something like a black spot in this affair.

I'm calling it a black spot, whether it's metaphorical or not. Moreover, this finds a few echoes in the conduct, which is not noted nearly enough, of what is known as a woman. It's quite curious that a woman should take such a lively interest in black spots. The first thing she does with her boy is to squeeze out his blackheads. It's a metaphor for the fact that she would rather her own black spot not take up quite so much space. This is still the button from earlier, the button on the inside-out glove.

Even so, we mustn't get muddled up. There are women who have to undergo delousing once in a while, like monkeys, but still, squishing vermin and squeezing out a blackhead really aren't the same thing.

We need to press on with our review.

The imagination of being the redeemer, at least in our tradition, is the prototype of père-version. This madcap idea of the redeemer emerged to the extent that there is a father-son relation, and this arose a long while back. Sadism is for the father, masochism for the son. All the same, Freud tried to rid himself of this sado-masochism. This is the only point at which there is a putative relationship between sadism and masochism.

These two terms bear strictly no relation to one another. To make it thinkable one really has to believe that it transpires as it does in the diagram of an infinite straight line passing through a torus. I think it forms enough of an image like this. One really has to believe in active and passive to imagine that sado-masochism is something that can be explained by means of a polarity.

Freud was very alert to something that is a great deal older than this Christian mythology, namely castration. Castration means that the phallus is transmitted from father to son, and this even entails something that cancels out the father's phallus before the son has any right to bear it. Freud refers to the idea of castration essentially in this manner, where castration is a transmission that is plainly symbolic.

Indeed, this is what leads me to pose the question of the relationships between the symbolic and the real. They are highly ambiguous, at least in Freud.

Here arises the question of the critique of the true. What is the true, if not the true real? And how does one distinguish between the true real and the false, unless one employs a metaphysical term – Heidegger's echt. This echt is on the side of the real, though. It's right here that Heidegger's entire metaphysics runs aground. In his brief passage on the echt, he admits, if I may so say, his échec, his defeat.

The real is to be found within the entanglements of the true. This is precisely what led me to the idea of the knot, which stems from the fact that the true pierces a hole in itself by virtue of how using it makes meaning out of whole cloth, given how it slides, given how it is drawn into the image of the bodily hole from which it is emitted, namely the mouth that sucks.

There is a centrifugal dynamic of the gaze, that is to say, one that starts off from the seeing eye but also from the blind spot. It starts off from the instant of seeing, and maintains it as its prop. Indeed, the eye beholds instantaneously. This is what one calls intuition, whereby it duplicates what is known as space in the image.

There is no such thing as real space. It is a purely verbal construction, which has been spelt out in three dimensions in accordance with the laws – as they are called – of geometry, which are those of the balloon or the bubble, imagined kinaesthetically, that is to say, oral-anally.

The object that I called object a is actually just one self-same object. I restored the name object to it because the object is ob, it constitutes an obstacle to the expansion of the concentric imaginary, that is, the englobing imaginary. The object is conceivable, that is, graspable in one's hand – this is the notion of Begriff – in the manner of a weapon. To evoke a few Germans who were not in the least bit daft, this weapon, far from being an extension of the arm, was a ranged weapon from the start. There was no need to wait for round shot to lob a boomerang.

What emerges from this review is that, on the whole, all that subsists of sexual relation is the geometry to which we alluded with regard to the glove. This is all that remains for the human race by way of a support for relation. Moreover, it is precisely in this respect that geometry has been engaged all along in matters of soufflure, in air chambers. Geometry more or less introduced the solid into it. It is still no less the case that we have to distinguish between the section of this solid and the solid itself.

What is most consistent in the chamber, that is to say, in the sphere, in the concentricity, is the cord in so far as it forms a circle, in so far as it turns round in a circle, in so far as it loops round into one sole loop, having initially been laid out in a planar diagram. After all, what is it that proves that a spiral is not more real than a ring? Well, in this latter case, nothing indicates that to join up with itself it would have to tie a knot, unless it were the one that is wrongly termed a Borromean knot, namely a linknot that quite naturally generates a trefoil knot.

The trefoil knot, to call it by its name, stems from this linknot when it is joined up at a, at b, and at c. It becomes continuous.

From the Borromean link to the trefoil knot

It is no less striking that when turned around like this it no longer forms a trefoil knot.

A false trefoil knot

This might not be abundantly plain for you, and it's not self-evident, but straightaway it was quite rightly noticed that if you change something here by passing this bight underneath, the immediate result is that the knot is entirely done away with.

What I'm raising as a question in this prate – namely, whether or not Joyce was mad – may find some bearings here.

After all, why shouldn't Joyce have been mad? All the more so given that this is not a privilege, if it's true that in most people the symbolic, the imaginary, and the real have become intertwined to the point that each forms the continuation of the other, for want of any operation that would set them apart as in the link of the Borromean knot – of what is claimed to be a Borromean knot, because the Borromean knot is not a knot, it's a link. Why not grasp that each of these loops continues in the next in a way that is strictly indistinct? By the same token, being mad is no privilege.

What I am proposing here is that we consider that Joyce's case corresponds to a way of making up for the knot's coming undone.

The unknot as a ring, then folded into a figure of eight and a false trefoil

This undoing forms a ring, pure and simple. When you fold the ring, you get this figure of eight. When you fold the upper loop over the lower loop, you get this, which looks like a trefoil knot, a cloverleaf, but isn't, because it will simply spring back to its initial ring shape.

One can rectify this by adding a buckle, thanks to which the supposed trefoil knot won't vanish into its constituent strand.

Buckle repairing the false trefoil knot[2]

Why not conceive of the case of Joyce in the following terms – isn't his desire to be an artist who would keep the whole world busy, or in any case as many people as possible, what compensates exactly for the fact that, let's say, his father was never a father for him? Not only did he teach him nothing, he neglected pretty much everything, save for relying on the good Jesuit fathers, the Church diplomatic.

The term diplomatic is in Joyce's text, specifically in Stephen Hero where Church diplomatic features word for word. In A Portrait of the Artist, however, his father speaks of the Church as a very fine institution, and the word diplomatic is again pushed to the fore. The plot in which all this develops no longer has anything to do with Redemption, which is nothing but babble here.

Is there not something along the lines of a compensation for this paternal abdication, this de facto Verwerfung, in the fact that Joyce felt himself to have imperiously received his calling? This is a word that results from a whole stack of things to be found in what he wrote. It is the specific mainspring by which the proper noun is something strange in Joyce.

I said I would be speaking about the proper noun today. Late in the day, I'm keeping my promise.

The name that is proper to him is what Joyce valorizes at the expense of the father. It is to this name that he wanted homage to be paid, a homage that he refused to anyone else.

It is in this respect that one is able to say that the proper noun does all it can to make itself more than the S_1, the master's signifier, which heads towards the S that I've labelled with the index of a subscript 2, which is that around which the gist of knowledge accumulates.

$$S_1 \rightarrow S_2$$

It's quite clear that the fact that there are two names that are proper to the subject was an invention that spread as the story unfolded. That Joyce was also called James links up in a succession only with the use of the alias – James Joyce also known as Dedalus.

The fact that we can pile up a whole stack of them ultimately leads to one thing – it introduces the proper noun back into the common nouns.

Well, listen now, since I've reached this point at this hour, you must have had your claque, your fill, and even your Jaclaque, because I'll add, too, the han that shall stand as the expression of the relief I feel for having completed this path today. So it is that I reduce my proper name to the most common noun.

10 February 1976

VI

JOYCE AND IMPOSED WORDS

Lacan's knot
Knots and links
Slips of the knot mended by the sinthome
Sexual equivalence = non-relation Symptomatic woman, ravaging man

I had invested some hope – and don't get the idea that this is some vanity or teasing – in the fact that it's half term. A lot of people go away. It's quite pronounced among my clientele. But not here. I can see that the doors are just as congested. All this is quite exasperating for me because it really doesn't set the right tone.

To be quite frank, I was hoping that the room wouldn't be so full, in view of which I was hoping to speak more confidentially, to stand in the middle of the room, I don't know. If there were just half of the people who are here it would be better. I would be able to speak in a fashion that is a shade more intimate.

Even so, it would be nice if I could manage to get some response, some collaboration, some active interest. It seems to me that it's hard to take an interest in what is becoming a research project. I mean that I'm starting to do what the word research implies, namely to go round in circles.

There was a time when I used to sound my bugle a bit more. Like Picasso, I used to say – I don't seek, I find. These days, however, it's tougher for me to clear my path.

1

All the same, I'm going to go back to what I suppose you heard last time. It's pure supposition. I'm reduced to supposing.

To get to the crux of it, I'm going to be illustrating.

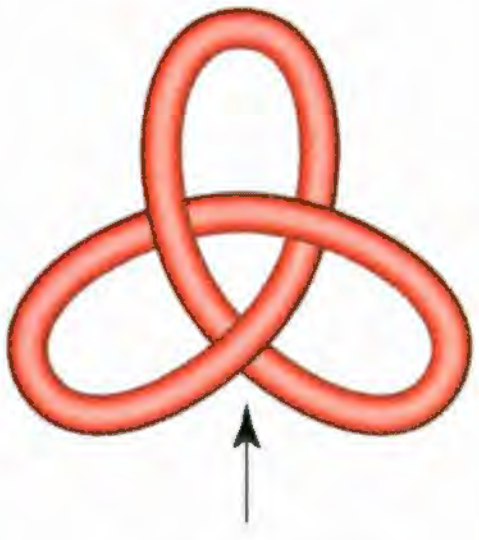
Here is a knot. This is the trefoil knot, a knot with three crossings, which is deduced from the Borromean knot. The latter is not a knot – contrary to its name, which, like all names, reflects a meaning – but a link. It carries the meaning that enables meaning to be located somewhere in the Borromean link.

When we call one element of the link the imaginary, another the real, and the third the symbolic, meaning, as I've already shown you, lies in the field between the imaginary and the symbolic. We cannot hope to place it anywhere else because we are reduced to imagining all that we ponder. Only, we do not ponder without words, contrary to what some psychologists have asserted, those of the Würzburg school.

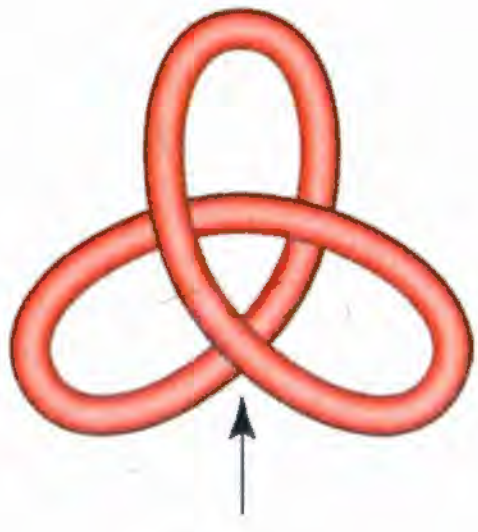
As you can see, I'm a little disappointed, and I'm finding it hard to get going. I'll come to the crux of the matter now, and say what can occur to what forms a knot.

What forms a knot is, at bare minimum, the trefoil knot. I make do with this because it's the knot that is deduced from the fact that the three rings of string of the imaginary, the real, and the symbolic form a knot. They form a knot in that they don't make do with merely determining a certain number of fields that are wedged in, a certain number of places where, were you to stick your finger in, you would feel a pinch. A knot is somewhere that you can also get pinched. Only, the knot is of a different nature.

So, last time, if you remember well – naturally I wouldn't expect that much – I put forward this remark, which is not self-evident, that all it takes is for there to be one mistake somewhere in the trefoil knot and it will be reduced to a ring. Suppose, for example, that here, instead of passing over, it passes under. That's all it takes.



Trefoil knot

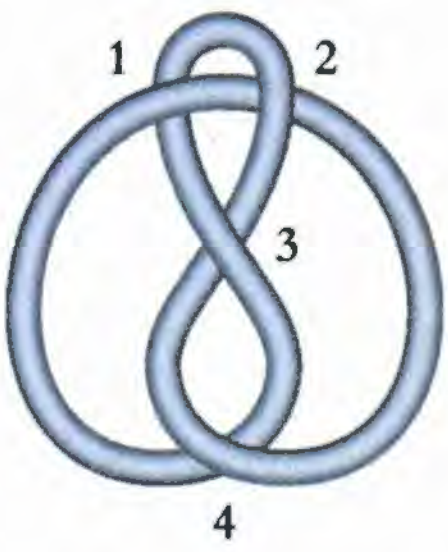


Unknot

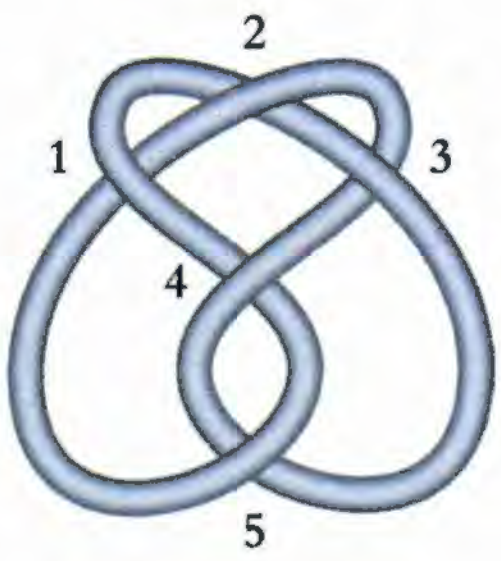
Everyone knows that there's no such thing as a knot with two crossings. So, all it takes is for there to be one mistake somewhere in the knot.

I think that this is blindingly obvious for you. Yet it's not self-evident.

Take, for example, the knot with five crossings. Since there is a well-known knot with four crossings called Listing's knot, I had the madcap idea of calling this knot with five crossings Lacan's knot.[1] Indeed, this is the knot that is most suitable, but I'll tell you about that another time.



Listing's knot



Lacan's knot

It's quite magnificent. As with every time one draws a knot, one runs the risk of making a mistake. Earlier, when I was drawing these things in order to present them to you, I came up against something of this kind, which meant that Gloria had to add a piece on, here. When one draws like this, one makes mistakes.

So, with the knot of five crossing points, if you make a mistake at either one of these two points labelled 4 and 5, the same thing occurs as in the trefoil knot, namely, the whole thing comes undone, and clearly that forms nothing more than a ring. If on the other hand you make a mistake at any one of these points here, 1, 2 or 3, you can observe that it still holds together as a knot, that is to say, it becomes a trefoil knot.

This is to tell you that it's not self-evident that, by making a mistake at one point of the knot, the whole knot evaporates, if I can put it like that.

What I said last time is the following – I alluded to the fact that the symptom, which this year I've been calling the sinthome, is what enables the Borromean link to be mended, should we no longer be making it a link, namely, should we have made what I have been calling a mistake at two different points.

The Borromean sinthome

Should the symbolic thereby come free, as I once noted it would, we have a way of mending it, which is to fashion what I defined for the first time as a sinthome. This is the item that enables the symbolic, the imaginary, and the real to go on holding together, even though here none of them are actually holding on to any of the others anymore due to the two mistakes.

Last time, I allowed myself to define as a sinthome that which enables the trefoil knot, not to go on forming a trefoil knot, but rather to maintain itself in a position that looks like it is forming a trefoil knot. That's what I was very gently putting forward.

Incidentally, I shall mention again what I thought – make what you will of my thought! – I thought that this was the key to what happened to Joyce.

Joyce has a symptom that starts off from the fact that his father was a failing father, a radically failing father. He speaks of nothing but that. I centred everything around the proper noun, and I thought – make what you like of this thought – that it was in wanting a name for himself that Joyce came up with a compensation for the paternal failing.

At the very least, that's what I said, because I couldn't say it any better. I'm going to try to articulate it in a more precise manner.

It is clear, however, that Joyce's art is something so particular that the term sinthome is really what suits it.

2

It so happens that last Friday, during my presentation of something that is generally considered to be a case, I dealt with a case, certainly a case of madness, which began with the sinthome of imposed words.

That, at least, was how the patient himself articulated something that appears to be all that is most sensible in the realms of an articulation that I may say to be a Lacanian articulation. How is it that any of us can help feeling that the words on which we depend are in some sense imposed upon us?

It is precisely in this respect that he who is called ill sometimes goes further than he who is called a man of sound mind. Rather, the question is why a normal man, a man said to be normal, doesn't notice that speech is a parasite, that speech is a veneer, that speech is a form of cancer that afflicts the human being? How is it that there are some who go so far as to sense this? It's quite certain that Joyce affords us a little inkling of this.

I didn't speak about his daughter last time because I didn't want to get caught up in what we might call side notes. His daughter, Lucia – for he gave his children Italian names – is still with us. She's in a home in England. She is what is commonly known as schizophrenic.

I was reminded of this during my last case presentation, in that the case I was presenting had taken a turn for the worse. After having felt – a feeling which, for my part, I consider to be quite sensible – that words were being imposed upon him, the patient had the feeling that he was affected by what he himself called telepathy. It wasn't what this word usually refers to, namely the fact of being aware of things that occur to others, it was that everyone else was aware of what he himself was formulating, everyone apart from him, namely, his inmost reflections, and most especially reflections that occurred to him on the fringes of these notorious imposed words.

For example, he heard something like low-down political assassination, which he made equivalent to low-down political assastination.[2] You can hear how the signifier is reduced to what it is, to the equivoque, to a torsion of the voice. In response to low-down assastination, or a low-down assassination said to be political, he told himself something that began with a but and which was his reflection on this subject. What left him utterly distraught was the thought that the reflections he came up with, over and above what he considered to be words that were imposed on him, were also known to everyone else.

He was therefore, as he put it himself, a sending telepath. In other words, he had no more secrets, nothing left in reserve. That was precisely what had led him to commit an attempt to end it all, which is known as a suicide attempt, which was also the reason he was there and the reason I had, all told, to turn my attention to him.

What is pushing me today to speak about Lucia is exactly the following – that Joyce, who put up a fierce defence on her behalf against the grip of the doctors, affirmed one thing, namely, that she was telepathic. In the letters he wrote about her he says that she is far more intelligent than everyone else, that she informs him – miraculously is the word that is implied – about everything that happens to a certain number of people, that for her these people hold no secret.

Isn't this something quite striking? Not that I think on any account that Lucia actually was telepathic, that she knew what happened to people about whom she had no more information than anyone else. But that Joyce attributed this virtue to her, through a number of signs and declarations that he understood in a particular way, is precisely where I can see how, in order to defend, as it were, his daughter, he attributes to her something that is an extension of what I shall for the time being call his own symptom.

In relation to the case of Joyce it is hard not to mention the case I saw last week, given the way that this came about for him. With regard to speech, one cannot say that something wasn't imposed upon Joyce.

In his efforts dating back to his first critical essays, then in A Portrait of the Artist, and ultimately in Ulysses and ending in Finnegans Wake, in what is in some sense the continuous progress that his art constituted, it is hard not to see how a certain relationship with speech is increasingly imposed upon him – namely, this speech that comes to be written while being broken apart, pulled to pieces – to the point that he ends up dissolving language itself, as has been very well noted by Philippe Sollers and which I mentioned at the start of the year. He ends up imposing on language itself a sort of fracturing, a sort of decomposition, which makes it so that there is no longer any phonatory identity.

There is undoubtedly a reflection here at the level of writing. It is through the intermediary of writing that speech is decomposed by imposing itself as such. This occurs through a warping, and it is ambiguous as to whether this warping lets him free himself from the parasite of speech I was speaking about earlier, or whether it leaves him on the contrary open to invasion from the essentially phonemic properties of speech, from the polyphony of speech.

Either way, in light of the patient whose case I was considering on the last occasion that I gave what is known as my presentation at Sainte-Anne, the fact that Joyce affirmed, in Lucia's defence, that she was telepathic, strikes me as a certain indication of what Joyce testifies to at this very same point, which I designated as being the point of the failing of the father.

What I sustain by means of the sinthome is here shown with a ring of string, which I suppose to be brought to bear at the very site where, shall we say, there is a mistake in the tracing out of the knot.

The mistake rectified at the site where it occurs[3]

3

We cannot help but observe that the slip is the very thing on which the notion of the unconscious is, in part, founded.

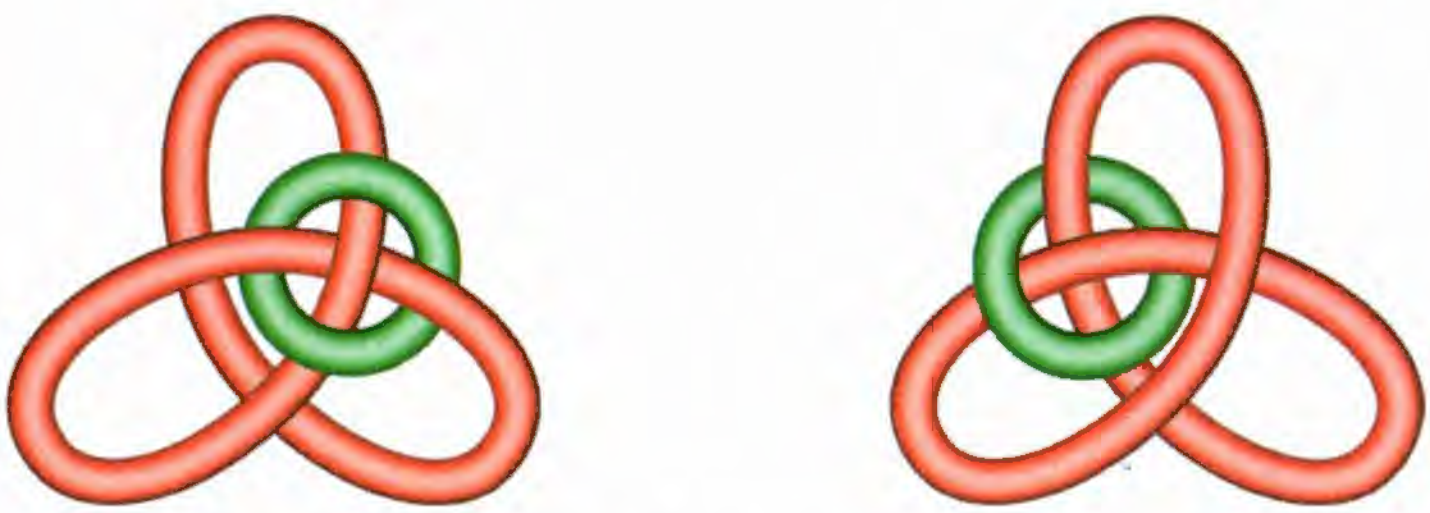
The witticism is too, but this has to be credited to the same account, as it were, because after all it is not unthinkable that it results from a slip. At the very least this is what Freud himself asserts by saying that it's a short-circuit, an economy with respect to a pleasure, a satisfaction.

The fact that this should lie at the site where the knot fails, where there is a kind of slip of the knot itself, is just what it takes to hold our attention. It occasionally happens that I mess up, as I have shown here, and this indeed is what confirms the fact that a knot is something that can be botched. Likewise, the unconscious is there to show us that it is on the basis of its specific consistency that there are piles of botched cases.

Here the notion of fault is making a return. Does fault, which conscience turns into a sin, belong to the realm of the slip? The equivocation of the word is also what allows it to be pondered, to pass from one meaning to another. Is there something that belongs to the realm of the slip in the initial fault that Joyce puts forward so strongly?

This brings to mind a whole imbroglio, but we're already in this imbroglio because we're in the knot, and by the same stroke we're in a tangle.

I spoke of rectifying the slip at the very site at which it occurs. This is not self-evident. Indeed, what does it mean, that it occurs at such a site? There is an equivocation because we meet the consequence of this at two other sites. What is striking about it is that it doesn't produce the same consequences at each of the two sites. If you pay close attention, you can see, in the way the knot responds, that when you put the sinthome at the very site where the fault occurs you don't get the same knot as you do when you rectify it at one of these other sites.



With the mistake rectified at one of the other two sites, the link is different[4]

Rectifying the slip at the two other sites is just as conceivable as doing so at the site where the mistake occurred, because it's a matter of making something of the primary structure of the trefoil knot subsist. Now, as you can see, what subsists due to the intervention of the sinthome will be different depending on whether the sinthome is placed at the very site of the slip or at one of the other two sites.

The striking thing is that there is a common feature that is shared in the way that the things are knotted, something which is marked in a certain direction, let's say the dextrorotary orientation, of the knotted compensation, of compensation by means of the sinthome. It remains no less clear that what results from this compensation will be different depending on the site at which it is placed.

The nature of this difference is as follows.

In what results from the rectification made to the trefoil knot at the two other sites, the sinthome and the figure-eight loop, that is to say, the red figure-of-eight and the green ring – which here take shape, as it were, spontaneously – can be permuted and are strictly equivalent.

Equivalence by permuting red and green

However, when the rectification is made at the site at which the mistake occurs, there is no such permutation.

You have only to take a figure-of-eight knot[5] and you will obtain with the greatest of ease the passage from one shape to another. Nothing could be more straightforward.

You just have to form an idea of how you would tug on the different parts in such a way that the red loop would form a ring, here. Nothing could be easier than to perceive that there is every chance that what was initially a green ring will become a green figure-of-eight. You will see when you try it out that it's a figure-of-eight that is likewise dextrorotary. So, it seems to me that there is a strict equivalence here.

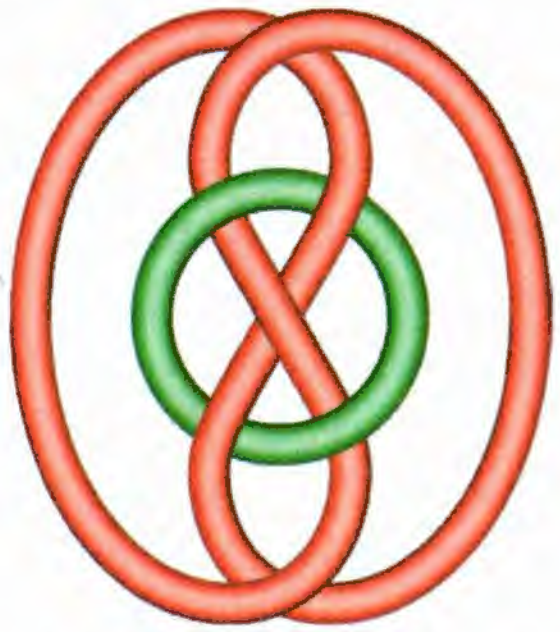
What about this thing I'm calling equivalence? After the path I've just cleared around sexual relation, it is not difficult to suggest that, when there is equivalence, there is no relation.

Let's look again at the trefoil knot. Suppose if you will that the two sexes are symbolized here by the two colours, and assume for the time being, as we already have, that from this point forth there is a failure of the knot.

We have observed that the failure of the trefoil knot is strictly equivalent in both sexes. If what we thus behold to be equivalent is supported by the fact that there has been a failure of the knot in either sex, the result is that both sexes are equivalent.

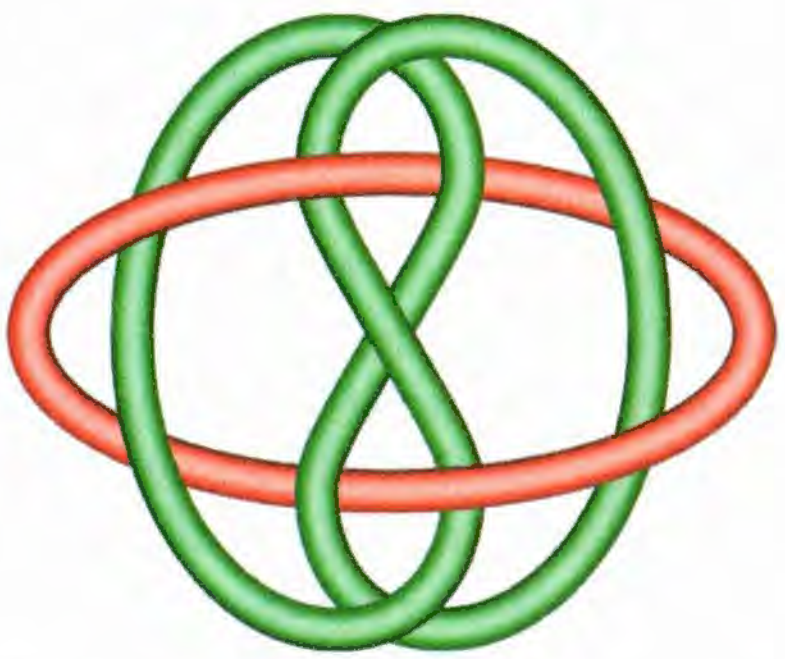
This is true, however, only with the proviso that should the fault have been rectified at the very site at which it occurs, the two sexes are no longer equivalent.

What about in this double figure-of-eight?



Double figure-of-eight[6]

What, then, corresponds to what just now I was calling equivalence is, in actual fact, far from being equivalent.



Non-equivalence in the permutation of red and green

One colour may very well be replaced by another, but whereas in the first diagram the green ring is, as it were, internal to the set of what is supported by the double figure-of-eight in red, in the second diagram the red ring is external to the double figure-of-eight in green.

It was on this point that I put to work our dear Jàcques-Alain Miller, who was at my country house at the same time as I was cogitating this. I put forward to him this shape – quite rightly, contrary to what I said to him – praying that he would uncover the equivalence that might have been produced. It is clear, however, that no such equivalence can be produced. This comes to light with the fact that the green ring will never be able to get through the outer band of the double figure-of-eight in red.

At the level of the sinthome, there is not, therefore, any equivalence to the relation between green and red, if we make do with this straightforward designation. To the extent that there is a sinthome, there is no sexual equivalence, that is to say, there is relation.

Indeed, if non-relation stems from equivalence, then relation is structured to the extent that there is no equivalence. Therefore, there is both sexual relation and no relation. Where there is relation, it is to the extent that there is sinthome, that is to say, to the extent that the other sex is supported by the sinthome.

I allowed myself to say that the sinthome is very precisely the sex to which I don't belong, that is, a woman. If a woman is a sinthome for any man, it's quite clear that another name needs to be found for what's involved in man for a woman, since the sinthome is characterized precisely by non-equivalence.

One can say that for a woman, man is anything you please, specifically an affliction that is worse than a sinthome. A ravage, even. If there is no equivalence, you're forced to specify what's involved in the sinthome.

There is no equivalence. This is the only thing, the only nook, in which what is known as sexual relation in the parlêtre, in the human being, finds a support.

Isn't this what is demonstrated for us in what is known as the clinic, which is another use of the bed. All the same, it is when we see beings in bed, and not only in hospital beds, that we are able to form an idea of what is involved in this notorious relation. This relation se lie, it is tied, lit being the operative word[7], in a tight bond with the sinthome. This is precisely what results, good heavens, from everything that I hear on another bed, the famous couch on which people go on about it at such length.

It's a matter of situating what the sinthome has to do with the real, the real of the unconscious, should the unconscious indeed prove to be real. How are we to know whether the unconscious is real or imaginary? That is the question. It partakes of an equivocation between the two.

This is what we are now committed to, thanks to Freud, and in the guise of the sinthome. I mean that henceforth we are dealing with the sinthome in sexual relation, which Freud held to be natural, which doesn't mean anything.

It is on this point that I shall leave you today, since I also have to mark in some way my disappointment at not having found you thinner on the ground this time.

17 February 1976

THE INVENTION OF THE REAL

VII

ON A FALLACE THAT VOUCHES FOR THE REAL testimony

The all and the set Borromean duality
Orientation and colour
Syntax and equivoque
The phallus and the real

Here I am, reduced to having to improvise. Not that I haven't been working since last time, and profusely so, but as I wasn't necessarily expecting to speak because in principle this is a day of strike, here I am, then, reduced to setting out what I did prepare a little after all, and even a great deal.

As usual, I was hoping there might be fewer of you.

I'm going to begin by showing you something that is not necessarily what you were anticipating, but which is not unrelated, something that I went to fetch before leaving and which I wanted very much to think about because I had promised as much to the person who is more than a little concerned in this.

I would like to let you know, or to remind you, for those who already know, that there is someone of whom I'm very fond, whose name is Hélène Cixous. It turns out that she had already produced a brief note on Dora in the sold out issue of Littérature in which I produced Lituraterre. Since then, she has turned it into a play, Portrait de Dora, which is being performed right now at the Petit Orsay. It's not bad, in my opinion. I told Hélène what I thought about it – I've been on first-name terms with her since I first met her – and I told her I would speak about it.

It's about Freud's Dora. This is precisely why I suspect that it might interest a few of you to go and see how it's been put together. It's been put together in a real fashion. I mean that reality, the reality of the rehearsals, for example, is ultimately what has dominated the actors. I don't know to what extent you will appreciate it, but it's quite certain that there's something quite striking in it.

It's about hysteria, Dora's hysteria more precisely, and it so happens that she's not the best hysteric in the cast. The woman who is the best hysteric plays another role, but on no account does she make a show of her hysteric's virtues. The woman who plays the role of Dora doesn't make a bad show of it. At the very least this is my sense of it.

There is also someone in it who plays the role of Freud. Naturally, he's in a right pickle. He looks rather bothered and you can hear it in his delivery. Well, he goes at it with great caution. It's all the less fortunate, for him at least, that he is not an actor. He stepped forward for the role. So, he's constantly afraid of overdoing Freud. In the end, the best thing I can tell you to do is to go and see it. What you will see bears the mark of the caution of the actor who plays Freud.

At the end of the day, the overall result of this is something that is altogether curious. We are faced with a hysteria – I think this will strike you, but then, perhaps you will appreciate it in a different way – that I could call incomplete. I mean that hysteria has always been in twos, since Freud anyway. Here we can see it reduced in some way to what I might call a material state, and this is why this is going to sit rather well with what I'm about to explain to you. The play lacks the element that was added some time ago – before Freud, when all is said and done – namely, the way that hysteria has to be understood. This produces something very striking and very instructive. It's a kind of rigid hysteria. You'll be seeing this presently because I'm going to show you what the word rigidity means here.

I won't speak any further about Portrait de Dora. I hope to have some echoes about it from the people who come to see me, for instance. Such things happen.

1

I'm going to speak to you about a link that I happen to have offered to your attention, the Borromean link.

It's no accident that it gets called a knot, because it does slide towards the knot. I'm going to show you this right away, but what you will see first of all, in my first drawing, is a kind of embedding of rigidity. It's not out of the question that the word link might representify this for you, so to speak, because a link is, after all, rigid.

The snag is, the link at issue here can be conceived of only as something that is highly supple. It is even important to consider it to be something that is altogether supple. I'm going to show you this as well.

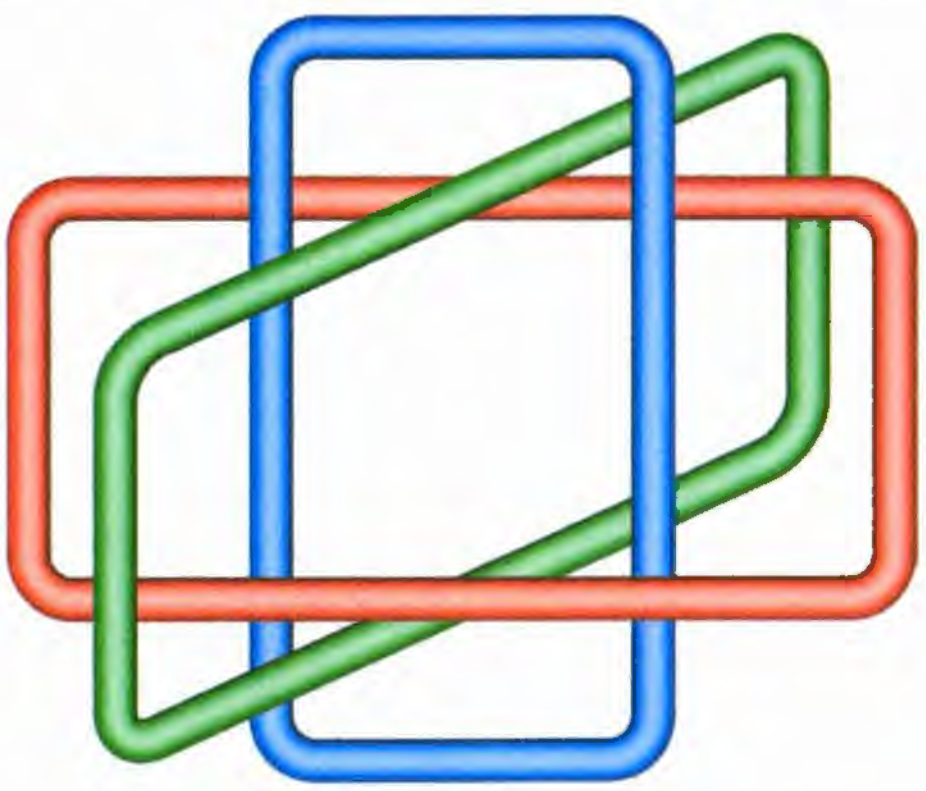
I was led to articulate this link, indeed to limn it, by conjoining to it the symbolic, the imaginary, and the real. What is important here is the real. After having spoken at great length about the symbolic and the imaginary, I was led to ask myself what the real might be in this conjunction.

Of course, the real cannot be just one of those rings of string. It's the way of presenting them in their linked-up knot that, in and of itself, forms the real of the knot.

You must nevertheless have cottoned on a bit to what it is that I have been trying to sustain the Borromean link with.

Here's what this yields. I wasn't minded to complete the drawing, but clearly it has to be completed to give a sense of what's at issue. Here, then, is the typical link.

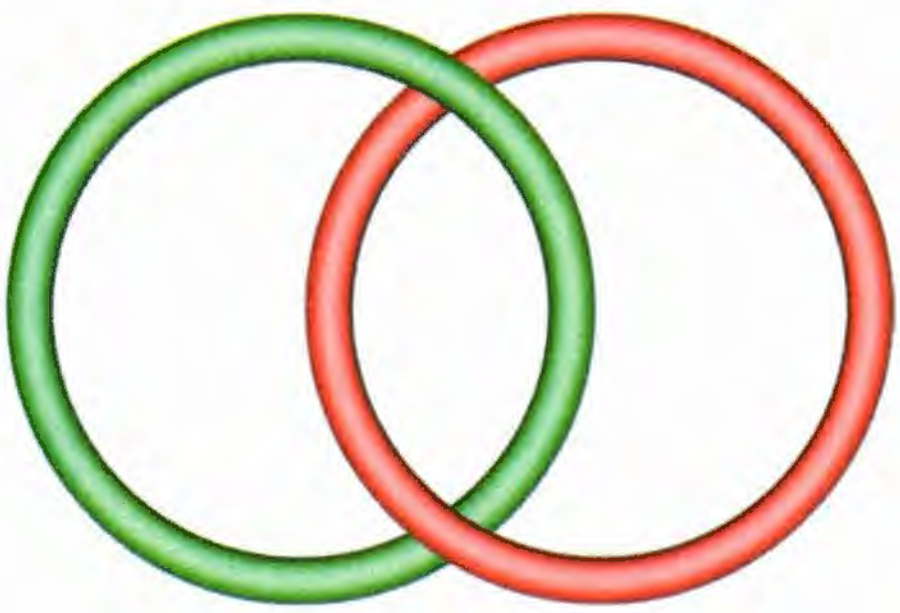


Typical Borromean link

The fact that here I'm tricolouring the trefoil knot is a reminder that this is derived from the Borromean link.

Tricoloured trefoil knot

You have seen how this can transform at the drop of a hat into something that looks like it would better deserve to be called a link, because this is, all the same, what most resembles what one usually considers a link to be.

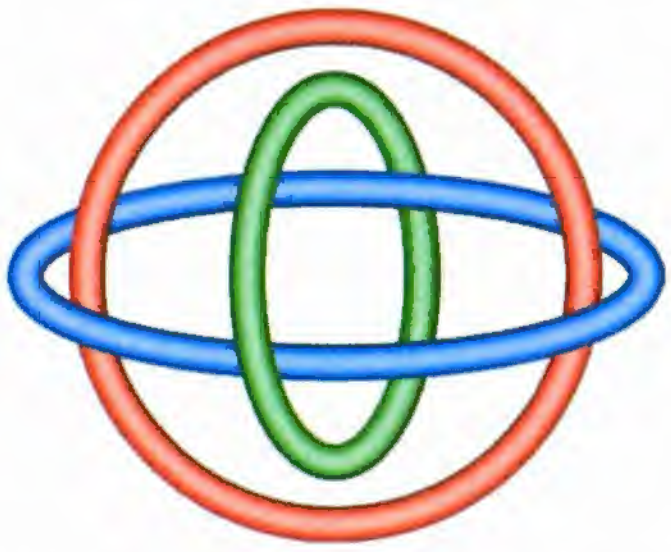


Two-ring 'Olympic' link[1]

Lastly, it is advantageous to figure the Borromean link as follows, by representing the three rings in a way that ought to be called projective.

Projective representation of the Borromean link

It is no less the case that there is an advantage to what I'm now about to present, taking care to position the three rings in a way that respects the layout of what I drew up before.



Borromean link simulating an armillary sphere

The advantage to the way I've presented the Borromean link is that it simulates a sphere, as I once mentioned to Dalí in conversation, I no longer recall when.

There is of course a difference between the Borromean link and what is always drawn in an armillary sphere when one tries to circularize the sphere at three levels, which one may call respectively transverse, sagittal, and horizontal.[2] You've never seen an armillary sphere represented in this fashion.

Since the false sphere that I've drawn here is supported by circles, there is a way of handling it that consists in flipping it over.

One cannot help but conceive of a sphere as being linked to the idea of the all. The fact that one quite readily represents a sphere by means of a circle links the idea of the all – which is actually supported only by the sphere – to the circle. But this is a mistake, because the idea of the all implies closure, whereas if one is able to flip this all, the inside becomes the outside.

Once we are using circles to support the Borromean link it becomes invertible, by virtue of the fact that the circle is in no respect what people believe it to be – something that symbolizes the idea of the all. Indeed, in a circle there is a hole.

It is only to the extent that beings are inert, that is to say, supported by a body, that one is able to say to someone, as was done at the initiative of Popillius – I have drawn a ring around thee, and thou shalt not step beyond it until thou pledgest me this.

In sum, here we meet again, with respect to what I have been calling by the name of the woman, the reason I asserted that she is not all. This means that women merely form a set.

Indeed, over time, we have reached the point that the idea of the all has been dissociated from the idea of a set. We have come to think that a certain number of objects can be supported by small letters, such that the idea of the all has been dissociated therefrom. In other words, the circle that is supposed to group together the objects a, b, c, and so forth, in a representation that is altogether fragile, is exterior to them.

The set {a, b, c}

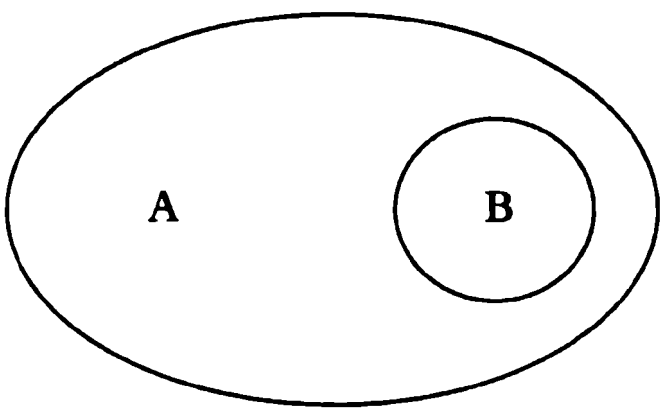
Specifying that the woman is not-all implies a dissymmetry between an object that one could call capital A – and we need to find out what it is – and a set with one element. If there is a pair, the two of them are united by being contained within a circle that, by virtue of this fact, turns out to be distinct from them. This is usually expressed by using braces, and is written thus – {A, {B}}. This says that within a set there is, on the one hand, an element, and on the other, a set with one single element.



The set {A, {B}}

2

I must, now, confess something.

Soury and Thomé had spelt out to me how a three-component Borromean link shows that it supports two different objects on the condition that the three rings that constitute it be coloured and oriented. These two conditions are required, and I assented to this.

In a second phase, I found myself in the disagreeable position of having imagined that simply colouring them would be enough to single out these two objects. This was because I had consented in a somewhat superficial way to the affirmation they had brought me.

Indeed, should we assign the colour red to one of the three rings, it is not the same object, when we give the colour green to this one and blue to this one, as it is when we do the opposite. This looks to be quite palpable. However, if we flip the sphere over, it is the same object. Thus, we will obtain with the greatest of ease a reverse layout.

Good heavens, I'll quickly draw this up for you. [Diagrams overleaf.]

Let's start off from what we have here [i]. If we consider that this is not rigid, then it is quite feasible to make the following representation of the red ring [ii]. If we are here, then it is likewise more than feasible to make the ring slide to where it's quite evident that it is able to be, and you obtain the following transformation [iii]. From here, it's quite feasible to make the red ring slide back down in such a way that the green ring, instead of the blue, now lies inside the red ring. The blue, on the contrary, lies outside the red [iv].

These things are not all that easy to demonstrate. What is immediate, and this is obtained by handling them – the simple thought that the three rings can be flipped, one over the other – is not obtained quite so easily as that. The proof is that the aforementioned Soury and Thomé, who quite rightly represented for me this way of handling things, only did so by getting a bit tangled up. I've tried to represent for you here how this transformation may effectively be said to operate.

What is it, all told, that brings us to a standstill in this immediacy, which is another sort of self-evidence, if I may say so, a self-evidence which, concerning the real, I designate with a joke, which I sustain by means of an évidem(m)ent? What resists self-evidence/emptying-out is the knotty appearance produced by what I have been calling the linknot, equivocating on link and knot. This knotty appearance, this knotty form, if I may say so, is what makes for the assurance of the real. I shall say therefore, on this occasion, that what vouches for the real is a fallace, since I have spoken of appearance.[3]

This differs from pseudo-evidence, because in my stupidity I initially took it to be self-evident that there could be two objects simply by colouring the circles. All in all, what is meant by this series of artifices that I have demonstrated to you? It is here that the difference between monstration and demonstration shows itself.

There is in some sense an idea of degeneration in demonstrating as opposed to monstrating. In demonstration, there is a decline in the monstration. All the waffle that emanates from self-evidence merely brings about the emptying out, on the condition that this is done in a signifying fashion.

More geometrico, which has long stood as the ideal support of demonstration, hinges on the fallace of formal self-evidence. This is altogether apt to remind us that, geometrically speaking, a line is nothing but the meeting edge of two surfaces, which are themselves cut from a solid. But it is another support that is furnished by the ring, by the circle – or whatever else, provided it is supple – it is a different geometry, which has to be grounded in the link.

Inversion

It's quite certain that I'm still exceedingly struck by my mistake, which I quite rightly qualified as stupidity. It affected me to a degree you can scarcely imagine. It's precisely because I want to perk myself up a bit that I'm now going to argue against what I believe to be an opinion held by Soury and Thomé, such as they expressed it to me.

To demonstrate that there are two different Borromean links, they thought it necessary to proceed by way of an exhaustive combination of three colourings and three orientations that were collocated upon each of the circles. On that occasion they remarked that all three need to be both oriented and coloured, and that it was not simply a matter of colouring some, orienting others, or orienting just one. I think I can take an opposing view. I even believe I am able to demonstrate what's at issue, in the sense that a demonstration is still close to a monstration.

I'm keeping the same colours as I used before. You know how I usually represent the Borromean link. I represent it differently from the classical representation in that I introduce two infinite straight lines. Using these two infinite straight lines, as opposed to circles that join them up, is enough to allow us to demonstrate that there are two different objects in the link, on the condition that a pair be coloured and the third be oriented, as is the case here.

dextrorotary levorotary

Inverting the orientation

I have spoken in terms of infinite straight lines because the infinite straight line, which Soury and Thomé are careful not to employ, is equivalent, at least as far as the link is concerned, to a circle when the line is completed by a point at infinity.

The two infinite straight lines are required to be concentric. I mean that they do not link up with one another as a link.

Desargues showed this a long time ago, but without specifying that the two straight lines in question, which are said to be infinite, must not link up. Indeed, in what he formulated, and which in its time I mentioned at my Seminar, nothing is specified regarding the nature of the point that is said to be at infinity.

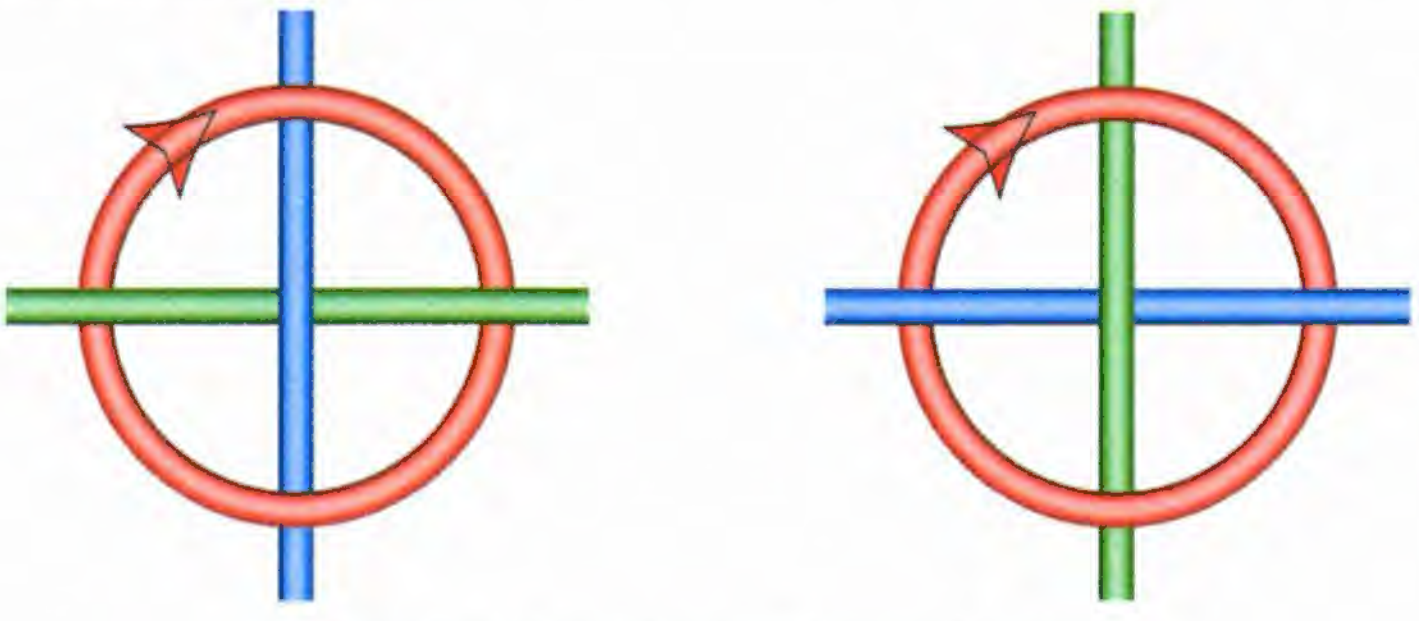
Then, we come to the following fact. Orienting the ring, which we are saying doesn't need to be in one particular colour, evidently already amounts to isolating it. Not to say that it is of any particular colour is already to turn it into something different. Nevertheless, it is not inconsequential to say that the three of them need to be oriented.

In the first of these two Borromean diagrams with an oriented ring, the orientation of the ring that is here in red is, from where we see it, dextrorotary. One should not assume that an orientation is something that is maintained across all cases. This is easy to prove. Specifically, by inverting the red ring – and inverting it implies that the two infinite straight lines are invertible as well – there will be an orientation that is exactly the opposite.

I said that it is enough for just one to be oriented. This is all the more conceivable when you make these two lines infinite. On the basis of what would we assign an orientation to them?

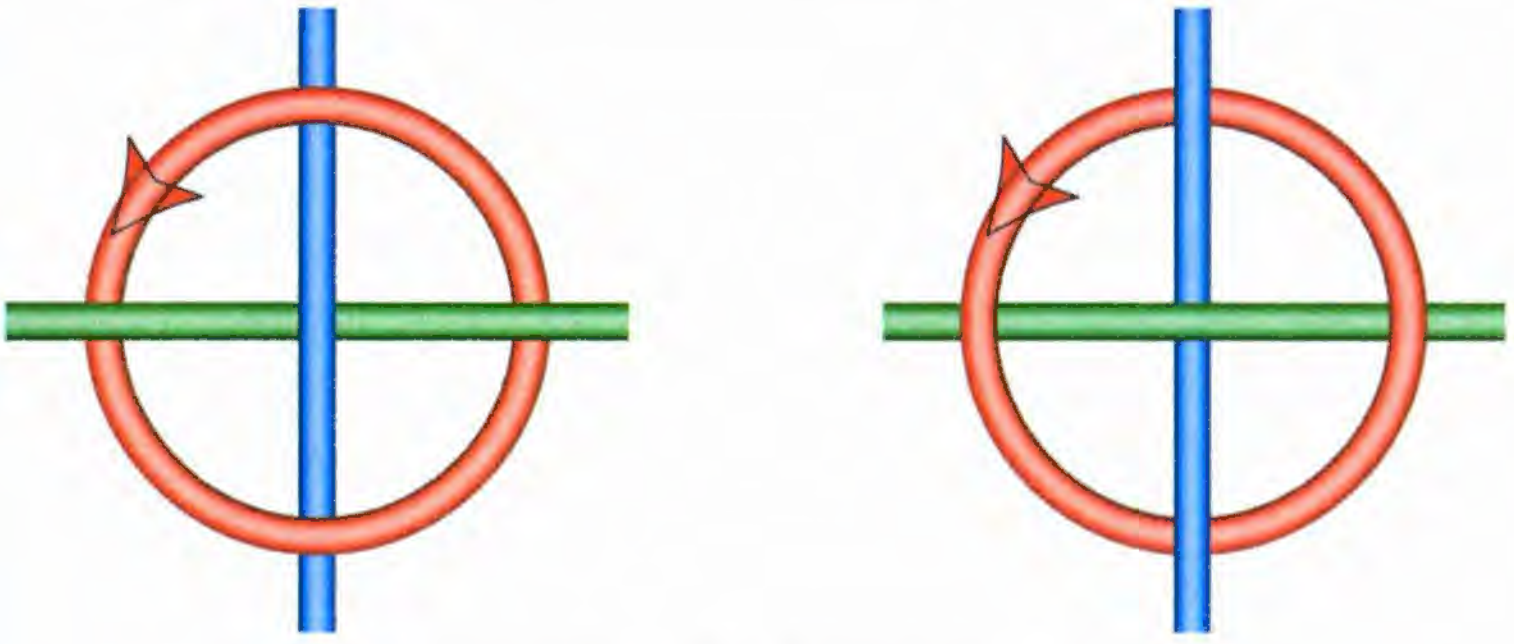
Likewise, it is entirely possible to evidence the second object on the basis of what lay behind the principle of my deception with respect to the colouring. By inverting the colours, I mean, and not the orientation.

By inverting the colours from the first diagram, the green and the blue, we obtain an object that is unquestionably different, provided we leave the oriented element with the same orientation. Indeed, why would I change the ring's orientation? It has no reason to be changed if I have changed the pair of colours. How would I ever recognize the non-identity of the complete object if I were to change the orientation?



Inverting the colours (blue and green)

Even if you invert this second object, you will see that it's well and truly different from the second one from earlier, for now it's a matter of comparing the levorotary ones with each other.



Comparison of the levorotary rings

In sum, it is the orientation that has been maintained that differentiates this triplicate from one where the triplicate could be said to have the same presentation.

3

The difference between the oriented ring and the coloured pair enables us to underscore the difference between what earlier I called the real as marked by a fallace and what is involved in truth.

Only that which has a thrust to it is true.

What is the real's relationship with the true? The truth about the real, if I may put it like that, is that the real, the real of this coloured pair here, has no sens, no thrust to it.

This statement plays on the equivoque of the word sens. What is the relationship between sens and what has been set down here in written form as an orientation? One can ask the question, and one can suggest an answer, namely – time.

The important thing is that on this occasion we are bringing in a pair that is said to be coloured, and that this pair has no thrust to it. Is the appearance of colour the appearance of vision, in the sense that I have singled it out, or the appearance of the gaze? Is it the gaze or vision that distinguishes colour? This is a question that I shall leave in suspense for today.

This notion of the coloured pair is designed to suggest that in sex there is nothing more than what I shall call the Being of colour, which in itself suggests that there can be woman with man's colour or man with woman's colour.

If we sustain what is involved in the symbolic by means of the red ring, then the sexes on this occasion lie in opposition as the imaginary and the real, as the idea and the impossible, to use my terms.

Is it altogether sure, however, that the real is always what is in question? I asserted that in the case of Joyce it is rather the idea and the sinthome, as I've been calling it. Hence the clarification that results from this regarding what a woman is. Here, she is not-all, on account of not being grasped, on account of remaining foreign to Joyce, on account of having no thrust to her, no meaning for him. Besides, does a woman ever carry a meaning for man?

Man is the bearer of the idea of the signifier. This idea is essentially sustained in lalingua by syntax. It is no less the case that if there is something that may be supposed in history, then it is that what I have called lalingua is begotten by the set of women, faced with a tongue that can be broken down, Latin on this occasion, because this is what is at issue at the origin of our tongues.

What is at issue is this fact of saying, examined with respect to what is involved of lalingua, with respect to what may have guided one out of the two sexes towards what I shall call the prosthesis of the equivoque, because what typifies lalingua among all the others is the equivoques that are possible in it, as I have illustrated with the equivoque between deux and d'eux.

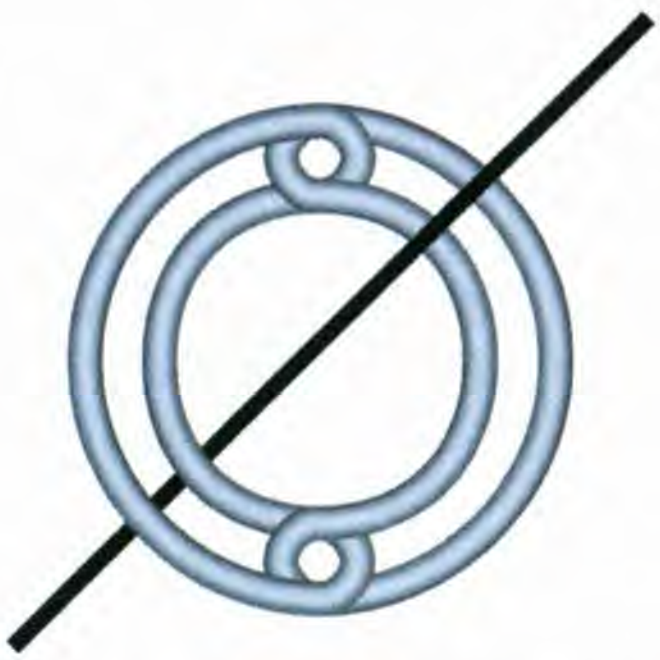
In each case, lalingua was begotten by a set of women.

I want to indicate something in relation to this point. We've spoken about a good many things today, except for what it is that constitutes the specificity of the Borromean link. The Borromean link would have no cause to be were it not for what I'm drawing here. And which, as usual, I'm drawing badly. The specificity of the Borromean link is indeed this, which I have already presented.

The false hole

As I underlined earlier, in a circle there is a hole. The fact that one is able, by taking one circle and joining to it another, to form this hole that consists in what passes through the midst of it, and which is neither the hole of one nor the hole of the other, this is what I am calling the false hole.

Should something – a straight line or a circle – traverse this false hole, then the latter thereby comes to be, as it were, verified. The essence of the Borromean link hinges on this verifying of the false hole, on the fact that this verifying transforms it, making it real.



Transformation of the false hole, making it real

Now, having had an opportunity to reread my Signification of the phallus, I had the pleasant surprise of finding in the very first line a mention of the knot. That was at a time when I was still a long way from turning my attention to the Borromean knot. On that occasion, the knot was the mainspring of castration.

It is indeed the phallus that has the role of verifying the false hole, making it real.

It is in so far as the sinthome forms a false hole with the symbolic that there can be any praxis whatsoever, that is to say, something that emanates from the dire, from the fact of saying, from what on this occasion I shall call art-dire, to slide towards ardour.

Joyce didn't know that he was fashioning the sinthome, I mean, that he was simulating it. He was oblivious to it and it is by dint of this fact that he is a pure artificer, a man of savoir-faire, which is what is likewise known as an artist.

The only real that verifies anything whatsoever is the phallus, in so far as it is the support of the function of the signifier. In that article, I underline that this function creates all that is signified.

It is still the case – I shall add in order to take this up next time – that there oughtn't to be any but this to verify this real.

9 March 1976

VIII

ON SENS, SEX, AND THE REAL

Orientation of the real, foreclosure of sens
The real is tied to nothing
Joyce's sinthome is unanalysable
The phallic function, between fantasy and phonation
Folisophy

Borromean link by Soury and Thomé

This is the most recent thing that Soury and Thomé have given me. It's a Borromean knot of my sort, made of two infinite straight lines and something circular. You can see, doubtless with a bit of effort, that it's Borromean.

The only excuse I have for saying something to you today – because, in truth, I need some excuse, at least in my eyes – is that this is going to be sensé, sensible. In view of which I shall not be doing what I would like to, which would be to give you un bout de réel, some odd or end of the real. It cannot go by any other name. You will see that I'm going to be clarifying this.

I am thereby reduced to telling myself that there is something sensible that can serve a purpose, provisionally. This provisional is, however, fragile. I'm not sure how long it will be able to serve its purpose.

1

I've been much preoccupied with Joyce of late, and I'm going to tell you why Joyce is so stimulating.

Joyce is stimulating because he suggests, though it's merely a suggestion, an easy way of presenting him. In view of which, and here indeed lies his worth and his weight, everybody has been hitting the wall with this, even my friend Jacques Aubert who is here in the front row and before whom I feel unworthy.

Jacques Aubert doesn't manage any more than anyone else, no more than the said Adams who has pulled off some tours de force in this area, to reach this easy way of presenting him. Perhaps in a while I will tell you, rather than suggesting to you, why this is so.

Of course, I too have been dreaming of this easy way of presenting Joyce. This is to be taken in the literal sense, because I dreamt about it just last night. Evidently – évidement, as one says, emptying out – you were my audience, but I was not an actor, and even, I was not an actor in the least. I was sharing with you the way that I – not an actor in the least, but instead what I would call a mediocre penman – judge characters who were not mine. Evidently, in this respect, I was overstepping my role, or rather, I had no part. It was something of the psychodrama kind. This is an interpretation.

That Joyce should make me dream of functioning in this way must have a value, a value that is, moreover, not easy to extract, because as I said he suggests to anyone and everyone that there must be a Joyce that is easy to handle.

He suggests this due to the fact that there is such á thing as psychoanalysis, and a whole load of people go scurrying off down this trail. It is not, however, because I am a psychoanalyst and, by the same stroke, overly concerned, that I should forbid myself from picturing him in this light, for there is all the same something objective here.

I would say that Joyce is an a-Freud, playing on the word affreux. Thus, he is an a-Joyce.

Every object, except the object that I call a, which is an absolute, abides by a relation. The annoying thing is that there is language, and that relations are expressed within it by means of épithètes, relatives. Relatives push towards yea or nay.

Upon this, a certain Charles Sanders Peirce built his own brand of logic, which due to the emphasis that he lays upon relation leads him to construct a ternary logic. This is precisely the same path that I have been following, with the slight difference that I call the things at issue by their name – symbolic, imaginary, and real, in the correct order.

To push towards yea or nay is to push towards the couple. This is so because there is a rapport, a relation, between language and sex. This relation has certainly not yet been altogether clarified, but I have, as it were, made a dent in it.

Did you catch that? In saying I've made a dent, I realize that I'm forming a metaphor. And what does this metaphor mean? I can speak about metaphor in the general sense, but I'll leave it up to you to find out what this one means.

Metaphor indicates this and nothing else – sexual relation. With the proviso that metaphor proves de facto, due to the fact that it exists, that sexual relation amounts to taking a bladder for a lantern[1], that is to say, the best one can utter to express a mix-up. A bladder can become a lantern on the condition you put a flame inside, but so long as there is no flame, it's not a lantern.

Where does this flame come from? The flame is the real. The real sets fire to everything. But it's a cold fire. The fire that burns is a mask, if I may say so, of the real. The real is to be sought on the other side, on the side of absolute zero. They've got to it, even that. There is no limit to the high temperatures one may imagine. For the time being there is no imaginable limit. The only thing that partakes of the real is the lower limit. This is what I call something orientable. This is why the real is orientable.

There is an orientation, but this orientation is not the thrust of it. What does that mean? I'm going back on what I said last time when I suggested that the sens, the thrust of something, might be its orientation. But orientation is not sens because it excludes the bare fact of the copulation of the symbolic and the imaginary, which is where the thrust of it lies. The orientation of the real, on my territory, forecloses sens.

I'm saying this because yesterday evening I was asked whether there are other types of foreclosure besides the one that results from the foreclosure of the Name-of-the-Father. It's quite certain that foreclosure has something more radical about it. In the end, the Name-of-the-Father is something slight. Yet it's certain that this is where it can serve a purpose, in the stead of the foreclosure of sens by the orientation of the real. Well, we haven't got there yet.

One has to break oneself up, if I may say so, with a new imaginary that establishes sens. This is what I'm trying to establish with my language, which has the advantage of wagering on psychoanalysis inasmuch as I try to institute it as discourse, that is to say, as semblance at its most vraisemblable, its most plausible. All in all, psychoanalysis is nothing more than a short-circuit via meaning, via sens as such. Just now I defined this as the copulation of language – since it is by means of this that I support the unconscious – with our body.

I have to tell you that in the meantime I went to listen to Jacques Aubert, somewhere else, where you weren't invited, and there I offered some reflections on the Ego, what the English call Ego, and what the Germans call the Ich.[2] I cogitated around this Ego on the basis of a knot that had itself been cogitated by a mathematician who goes by the name of Milnor. He came up with an idea of the link which I'm going to have to draw.

I'm redoing it because, of course, I'm getting in a muddle, as I do every time I draw a knot. This is not the first time this has happened to me in front of you. Here it is, drawn properly. It's a link with two components. You should be able to see that it holds fast.

Link described by Milnor[3]

Suppose, says Milnor, that you allow that in any such two component link one of the components is able to cross itself in such a way that what formerly crossed over now crosses under. Then, there is no more link. Of course, there are an abundance of further examples.

What I now offer to your astuteness is the remark that if you double each of the components in the link, this will no longer be true,[4] as invraisemblable, as implausible, as this may seem. You will check this, I hope. I didn't bring my drawings so I shan't venture to show you its writhe. If a figure-of-eight loop crosses itself, it easily comes free. Why ever should this not be true when there are two of them, two figures-of-eight and two ovals?

I'll come back to this next time. Not only is there an obstacle, it is also radically impossible to separate the four components.

2

On this point, I need to tell you that I cannot trace out all the algorithms of the S(Ⱥ) type, S of barred A.

What does it mean that I protest, in my Seminar Encore – so it would seem, because of course I've never read it, indeed I'd completely forgotten it, but a few others have apparently been wondering what it means – against confusingly equating the S(Ⱥ) with the phi function. Not the lowercase φ, but the capital Φ, which is a function, as is implied by what I indicated, namely – there exists an x for whom this function is negative, $\exists x.\ \overline{\Phi x}$.

Of course, the ideal of the matheme is that everything should correspond. It is precisely in this respect that the matheme wades in on the real. Indeed, this correspondence is not the final term of the real, contrary to what people imagine, without knowing why. As I said earlier, we can only reach odds and ends of the real.

This real, the real at issue in what is called my thought, is always an odd or an end, a core. It is certainly a core around which thought embellishes, but the mark as such of this real is that it doesn't tie on to anything. This at least is how I conceive of the real.

There have been little points of emergence throughout history. One day, a certain Newton found one of these odds or ends of the real. That bloody well put the wind up all the thinkers, foremost among them the likes of Kant who may be said to have turned Newton into a sickness. Furthermore, all of them, all the pondering creatures of the time, each in their own way turned him into one. That came raining down not only on the men but on the women too. Madame du Châtelet wrote a whole book on the Newtonian System where she takes abundant leave of her senses. It is all the same extraordinary that reaching an odd or end of the real should produce such an effect. It is, however, from here that one should start off. It is the very sign that one has reached the core.

I'm trying to offer you an odd or end of the real with respect to where we are. We are at the place of this incredible story that is the human race.

I tell you in this respect that there is no sexual relation, but this is embellishment because it partakes of the yea or nay. As soon as I say there is no . . ., it's already very suspicious as to whether this truly is some odd or end of the real because the mark of the real is that it is tied to nothing, as I said a moment ago.

One recognizes oneself only in what one has. One never recognizes oneself in what one is. This is implicit in what I have been putting forward. It is implicit in the fact, which Freud acknowledged, that there is an unconscious.

That one never recognizes oneself in what one is is the first step of psychoanalysis, because what one is, when one is a man, belongs to the realm of copulation, that is to say, to what reroutes this said copulation into the no less uttered, and significantly so, copula constituted by the verb to be.

In its change of direction towards the copula, language meets the proof that it is a rerouting that is altogether vessie, bladder-like, that is to say, obscure. Obscure is but a metaphor here, because were we to have an odd or end of the real, we would know that light is no darker than shade, and vice versa.

The metaphor copula is not proof in and of itself. This is the way of proceeding that the unconscious has – it only gives traces, which not only efface themselves of their own accord, but which any use of discourse strives to efface, the analytic discourse like the rest.

You yourselves will reckon only on erasing the traces of mine from discourse, since I'm the one who started out by furnishing the analytic discourse with its status, on the basis of affecting a semblance of the object a, that is, my naming of man putting himself in the place of the refuse that he is – at the very least in the eyes of a psychoanalyst, who has good reason to know this, for he himself puts himself in this place. One has to go via this determined refuse so as, perhaps, to retrouver, to find again something that might belong to the order of the real.

But you see, I'm using the word retrouver. This is already a slide, as though everything of this order had already been found. Such is the snare of history. History is the greatest of fantasies, if it may be expressed like this. Behind the history of the facts in which historians take an interest, there lies myth.

Myth is always captivating, the proof being that, having carefully borne witness to the sinthome of Dublin that only has any soul to it by dint of his own, Joyce doesn't fail – fabulously – to fall into the Vico myth that sustains Finnegans Wake. The only thing that nevertheless saves him from this is that Finnegans Wake presents itself as a dream.

Not only is it a dream, but it denotes how Vico is a dream just as much as Madame Blavatsky's diffuse bleed, the manvantara and everything that ensues, the idea of a rhythm that I fell back into myself with my retrouver just now. One never finds again – or else, this denotes how one only ever turns round in circles – one finds. The only advantage of this finding again is to highlight what I'm indicating, that there cannot be any progress, that one only ever goes round in circles.

Even so, there is perhaps another way of explaining that there is no progress. It is that there is no progress but bearing the stamp of death, which Freud underscores by triebing this death, if I can put it like that, by making it a Trieb. This was translated into French by pulsion or pulsion de mort. I don't know why they didn't find a better translation when there was the word dérive.

The death drive is the real inasmuch as it can only be pondered qua impossible. This means that each time it rears its head it is imponderable. To approach this impossible could never constitute a hope, because this imponderable is death, whose real grounding is that it cannot be pondered.

What is incredible is that Joyce – who harboured the greatest contempt for history, however futile, which he qualifies as a nightmare whose character is to bring down upon us those big words that he says make us so unhappy – was only able to find the solution of writing Finnegans Wake, namely a dream, which like any dream is a nightmare, even if it's a toned-down nightmare. With one slight difference, says he, and this is how Finnegans Wake is fashioned, it's that the dreamer is not any one character, he is the dream itself.

It is in this respect that Joyce slides . . . slides . . . slides to Jung, slides to the collective unconscious. There is no better proof than Joyce that the collective unconscious is a sinthome, for it cannot be said that Finnegans Wake, in his imagination, does not partake of this sinthome.

So, the sign of my entanglement is indeed Joyce, precisely inasmuch as what he puts forth, and in a way that is quite especially that of an artist because he has the know-how to pull it off, is the sinthome, and a sinthome such that there is nothing to be done to analyse it.

A rock-solid catholic, as was Joyce, who never did anything to compromise his proper upbringing by the Jesuits, a catholic, a genuine article – but of course, there are no genuine ones here, you weren't raised by Jesuits, not a single one of you – well, a catholic is unanalysable.

I said as much recently, during an evening event with Jacques Aubert. On that score, someone made the remark that I said the same thing about the Japanese. It was Jacques-Alain Miller, of course, who didn't let the opportunity slip by.

Well, I stick by this, though it's not for the same reason.

3

Since the Jacques Aubert evening, to which you were not invited, I've seen a film. It too was Japanese.

It was on a small screen so it wasn't possible to invite you there any more than it was to Jacques Aubert's event. And then, I wouldn't have wanted to give the wrong idea. I did, however, pick out a few people from my School to watch the film, and I suppose they were as taken aback as I was. This is the term I used to speak of the effect it had on me.

I was taken aback because it's female eroticism. I wasn't expecting that in going to see a Japanese film. Watching it, I started to understand the power of Japanese women.

It was a private screening, but I do hope that it will be certified for general release. If you scamper around a bit you will manage to see it on one of the restricted viewing screens. They'll ask you to produce some ID. You could tell them that you come to my Seminar.

I'm not going to set down a dividing line just on the basis of a film, but female eroticism seems to be carried to its extreme point here, and this extreme is the fantasy, no more nor less, of killing the man. But even that does not suffice. Having killed him, she goes further still. Afterwards – why after? there lies the doubt – the Japanese woman in question, who is a maîtresse femme, a boss lady, if ever there was, slices off her partner's dick. That's what it's called. One wonders why she didn't do it beforehand.

We know that it's a fantasy, all the more so given that there's a great deal of blood in the film. I'm fine with the idea that the corpus cavernosum might be blocked, but in the end, what do I know? I don't know how this plays out after death.

There is a shade of what just now I called doubt. This is where one can clearly see that castration is not the fantasy. It is not so easy to situate it in its function in analysis because it can be fantasmatized.

This is why I come back to my capital Φ, which might just as well be the first letter of the word fantasy.

This letter situates the relations of what I shall call a phunction of phonation. This is the essence of the Φ, contrary to what people believe. It is a phunction of phonation that finds itself being a placeholder for the male, said to be man, as such.

In the Seminar Encore, I took a stand against this Φ being a placeholder for the signifier that I have only been able to sustain by means of a complicated letter of mathematical notation, namely S(Ⱥ). S of barred A is something altogether different from Φ. It is not that with which man makes love. In the end, he makes love with his unconscious, and nothing more. As for what the woman fantasizes, if this is really what the film presents us with, it is something that, either way, impedes the encounter.

What is meant by S(Ⱥ)?

If the intermediary, that is to say, the instrument, that one uses for copulation is really to be cast away, as is quite obvious, this is not of the same order as what is at issue in my capital S of barred capital A in brackets.

The capital A is barred because there is no Other – not where something makes up for this, namely the Other as the locus of the unconscious, which I've just said is what man makes love with, in another sense of the word with, and that's what one's partner is – the big Other is barred because there is no Other of the Other.

I beg your pardon for not having anything besides the bar at my service. There is a bar that any woman knows how to get her leg over, and that is the bar between signifier and signified, as I hope the film I alluded to earlier will have proven for you. It is like the bar that lies over $\overline{\Phi x}$. There is another bar that consists in barring. Moreover, I regret not having made it like the first one, because it would have been most exemplary like that. Positioned in diagonal through the capital A, this bar says that there is no Other that could respond as a partner.

The full necessity of the human race is that there should be an Other of the Other. This is what is generally called God, but which analysis unveils as being quite simply La femme, The Woman.

The only thing that allows The Woman to be supposed is that, like God, she should be a spawner.

Only, the progress that analysis leads us to make has been to have us realize that, even though the myth makes her all issued from just one mother, namely from Eve, there are only particular spawners. And this is the sole thing that allows her to be denoted by means of the definite article The, because I've told you that The Woman does not exist, and I've voiced more and more reasons to believe it, especially after seeing this film.

It is in this respect that I called to mind, in the Seminar Encore – so it would seem – what this complicated letter means, namely the signifier of the fact that there is no Other of the Other.

There you go. Everything I'm telling you here is nothing but sensé, sensible. In this capacity, it is heavy with risk, the risk of going awry, as all history proves. We've never done anything but that.

If I'm taking these same risks, it is much rather to prepare you for what else I might tell you, by trying to do some folisophy, so to speak, that is less sinister than the book in the Bible known as The Book of Wisdom, though in spite of everything this is the best one can do to ground wisdom on lack, which is the sole grounding it is able to have. It's really not bad at all. It's top notch. I recommend that you read it. It is sober and hits the right tone.

Catholics seldom read it. One could even say that over the centuries Catholicism has consisted in preventing its followers from reading the Bible.

Will I manage to tell you – it oughtn't to be merely a dream – what would qualify as an odd or end of the real, in the proper sense of the [French] word bout, which I specified earlier?

For the time being, we may say that Freud himself produced nothing but sensibleness, and this takes away all my hope. This is not, however, a reason, not for me to hope to, but for me really to do so someday.

That's enough for today. One has to laugh a bit once in a while.

16 March 1976

IX

FROM THE UNCONSCIOUS TO THE REAL

A new type of idea
Energetics and the real Meaning is the Other of the real
The Name-of-the-Father: bypassing it, making use of it
The real is lawless

I usually have something to tell you but today, because it's a special occasion – it's my birthday – I should like to be able to verify whether I know what I'm saying.

In spite of everything, the fact of saying aims to be heard. I would like to verify whether, all in all, I don't content myself with speaking for my own sake – as does everybody, of course, if the unconscious carries a meaning.

Today, therefore, I would prefer it if someone would ask me a question. I said a question. I'm not asking for several. On no account am I asking for miracles, for sparks to start flying.

What I would undoubtedly like most is for someone to write something down that might justify the trouble I've been going to for a little over twenty-two years now. The only way to justify it would be for someone to invent something that might serve me in some way. I'm of the mind that this is possible.

1

I invented what has been written as the real.

Naturally, writing it down, real, does not suffice. A fair few did that before I did. I have written this real in the form of the Borromean knot, which isn't a knot but a link on account of possessing certain properties. In the minimal form in which I have traced out this link, there have to be at least three elements.

That's what the real is. The real consists in calling one of those three real.

This means that there are three elements, and these three, in the way they are knotted together – well, actually, linked together – form a metaphor. It's nothing more, of course, than a metaphor of the link.

How can it be that there is such a thing as a metaphor of something that is nothing but number? This metaphor, on account of this, is called cipher.

There are a certain number of ways of tracing out ciphers. The simplest way is the one that I have called the unary trait. Moreover, marking down a certain number of traits or points is enough to indicate a number.

What is known as energetics is none other than the handling of a certain amount of numbers from which a constant number is extracted. In referring to science such as it was conceived of in his time, Freud took this as a reference point. He just turned it into a metaphor. He never really gave any grounding to the idea of psychical energetics. He wasn't even able to draw metaphor from it with any vraisemblance, with any plausibility. For example, the idea of a constant which would bind stimulus to response can in no way be upheld.

I have been saying that I invented something in the metaphor of the Borromean link. What does it mean, to invent? And what have I invented? Is it an idea?

Don't let this prevent you from trying in a short while to pose me a question that will reward me – not for the effort that I'm making right now, because, precisely, I think that for the moment what I'm saying to you doesn't stand much of a chance of drawing any response.

Is it an idea, this idea of the real such as it is written in the Borromean knot, which, I insist, is actually a link? It's not an idea, not one that can be upheld. This is where we touch upon the fact that the idea, the idea that occurs to us just like that when we are lying down, is merely that, at least when reduced to its analytic value – an idea that occurs to you when lying down.

Whether we're lying down or on our feet, the link effect that we obtain through writing is not something that can be pondered easily. In my experience, at the very least, a link composed of a certain number of elements, even when they are reduced to three, is something that can be neither easily imagined nor easily written. One really has to make sure that one is fairly well-versed in it if one is to be confident of succeeding in providing its written form. It's precisely this that you have witnessed umpteen times in my mistakes, well, in the slips of my hand, when I stand before you trying to write something that symbolizes this link.

I consider the fact of having stated the real in question in the form of this writing to possess the value of what is generally called a trauma. Not that my aim was to traumatize anyone, especially not my audience, whom I have no reason whatsoever to be mad at to the point of causing them a trauma. Let's say that this is the forcing of a new kind of writing, which possesses, through metaphor, a scope that really has to be called symbolic. It is also the forcing of a new type of idea, if I may say so, an idea that does not burgeon spontaneously from the simple doing of that which forms meaning, that is to say, from the imaginary.

Nor is it the case that this should be something entirely foreign. I would go further still by saying that this is what renders palpable, that this is what lets us put our finger on, what might be called reminiscence, albeit in an utterly illusory fashion. Reminiscence consists in imagining, with respect to something that holds the function of an idea but which is not one, that one is reminiscing it, if I may express myself in this way.

Reminiscence is distinct from remembering. These two functions are set apart in Freud, who had a nose for distinctions.

Remembering is evidently something that Freud completely forced by virtue of the term impression. He presumed that there were things in the nervous system that became imprinted, and he furnished them with letters, which was already to say too much because there is no reason for an impression to be figured as this thing that we call a letter, which is already considerably far removed from impression. A letter and a phonological symbol are worlds apart.

The idea that Freud attests to in the Project is to figure this by means of networks, and this is perhaps what prompted me to give them a new form, a more rigorous form, by turning them into something that links up in a chain instead of simply weaving together.

Remembering amounts to introducing these links – and this is certainly not an easy thing to do, the many slips I have made in trying to trace out on this piece of paper the knots that were placed under the patronage of the Borromeo family stand as proof of this – into something that is already there and which bears the name knowledge. Indeed, I tried to be rigorous by saying that what Freud sustains as the unconscious always presupposes a knowledge, and a spoken knowledge as such. The unconscious is wholly reducible to a knowledge. This is the minimum that is presupposed by the fact that the unconscious may be interpreted.

It's quite clear that this knowledge has the minimum requirement of two supports, which are called terms and which are symbolized with letters, hence my way of writing knowledge as supported by S subscript 2, S_2. This is not S to the power of two, it is not

S squared, it is S supposed to be twain. The definition I give of the signifier, which I support with S subscript 1, S_1, is to represent a subject as such, and to do so truthfully. Truthfully on this occasion means in conformity with reality.

The truthful is a fact of saying in conformity with reality. On this occasion, reality is what functions, what functions truthfully. However, what functions truthfully has nothing to do with what I denote as real. That my real – for I really do have to put it under my name – should condition reality, the reality of your hearing, for example, is an altogether precarious supposition. Here lies a gulf, and we are a long way from being able to ensure that it is bridged.

In other words, the instance of knowledge that Freud reiterates, I mean, renovates, in the shape of the unconscious, does not on any account necessarily presuppose the real that I make use of.

I have been a vehicle for much of what is known as the Freudian thing. I even gave the title The Freudian Thing to something I wrote. When it comes to what I call the real, however, I invented, because it imposed itself upon me. Perhaps some of you here remember how and at what point this notorious knot arose, this knot being all that is most figurative. To say that to the imaginary and the symbolic, that is to say, to things that are utterly foreign to one another, the real brings the element that can make them hold together, is the maximum that may be figured thereof.

This is something which I can say I consider to be nothing more than my symptom. I mean that it's my own particular way of carrying Freud's lucubration to its degree of symbolism, to the second degree – if indeed there is such a thing as may be termed Freudian lucubration. Let's say that it's to the very extent that Freud articulated the unconscious that I react to it.

Here we can already see that this is one way of carrying the sinthome itself to the second degree. It is to the very extent that Freud truly made a discovery – supposing this discovery to be true – that it may be said that the real is my symptomatic response.

To reduce this response to being symptomatic is also to reduce any and every invention to the sinthome.

2

Let's change places.

Does one possess a memory? Might it be said that we do more in saying that we have one than in imagining that we have one, that we have one at our disposal? I should say that we have it at our dire-sposal, that on a à dire.

The tongue that I have called lalinglish has all sorts of resources for saying on a à dire. I have to tell. It's been translated as J'ai à dire, which is an Anglicism. But the fact that one may say not only have but also ought, I ought to tell, produces a slide.[1] J'ai à dire becomes Je dois dire. Likewise, in the fact that one can accentuate the verb in such a way as to be able to say I do make, I'm insisting, all told, on the fact that through this making there is nothing but fashioning. There is also the fact that one can equally separate out the negation in the form I don't, which means I abstain from doing this or that. I don't talk, which means I choose not to speak. To speak what? In Joyce's case it was Gaelic.

This presupposes or implies that one chooses to speak the tongue that one does effectively speak. In actual fact, one does no more than imagine to oneself that one is choosing it. Moreover, what resolves the issue is that, at the end of the day, one creates this tongue. This is not restricted to the phases during which a tongue is created. One creates a tongue inasmuch as, from one instant to the next, one endues it with meaning, one gives it a little nudge, without which it would not be a living tongue. It is a living tongue to the extent that one creates it from one instant to the next. It is in this respect that there is no collective unconscious. There are only particular unconsciouses, to the extent that every single one of us, from one instant to the next, gives a little nudge to the tongue we speak.

So, what is at issue for me is to find out whether I don't know what I say to be true. It falls to each of you who are here to tell me how you hear it. After all, it is by no means sure that what I might say of the real amounts to anything more than speaking out of place.

Saying that the real is a sinthome, my sinthome, does not prevent energetics, which I spoke about earlier, from being any less of one. What would the privilege of energetics boil down to? Well, on the condition that things are handled in the right way, in conformity with certain mathematical teachings, one always finds a constant number. One does sense, however, that from one moment to the next this is a requirement that is, as it were, pre-set.

The thing that in and of itself constitutes energetics is that some trick has to found in order to obtain the constant. The suitable trick, the one that succeeds, is supposed to be congruent with what is known as reality. But I draw a firm distinction between, on the one hand, the supposed real, which is that organ, so to speak, that has nothing whatsoever to do with an organ in the flesh, by which imaginary and symbolic are tied together in a knot, and, on the other hand, that which plays its part in grounding the science of reality.

The real at issue is illustrated by the fact that, in this planar diagram of the knot, I show one field, the field of meaning, to be essentially distinct from the real. One can say that the real both carries and does not carry a meaning, in view of the fact that the field of meaning is distinct from it.

That the real carries no meaning is what is figured by meaning being over there and the real being over here.

The true hole lies here

The symbolic is distinct in being specified, as it were, as a hole. What is striking, however, is that the true hole is here, at the site where it is revealed that there is no Other of the Other.

This would be its place, just as meaning is the Other of the real, but there is nothing of the like. In the place of the Other of the Other, there is no order of existence. It is precisely in this respect that I am given to think that the real has no existence either.

I am given to think that the real lies in abeyance, as it were. It might be what I've reduced it to, in the form of a question, namely, nothing but a response to Freud's lucubration, which, anyway, one may say is quite repellent to energetics. It is utterly up in the air as far as this energetics is concerned.

The sole conception that is able to make up for the said energetics is the one that I have set out using the term real.

3

[The written questions are read out by Lacan]

I'm being asked the following – If psychoanalysis is a sinthome – I didn't say that psychoanalysis was a sinthome – is it not the case that what you've been doing with your knot and your mathemes is to decipher psychoanalysis, with the consequence of dissipating its signification?

I don't think psychoanalysis is a sinthome. I think it's a practice whose effectiveness, which despite everything is palpable, implies for me that I should make what I have called my knot, namely the triple knot up there on the blackboard. It is in this respect that I have been holding in abeyance the approach to the third element that is distinct from reality and which I call the real. It is in this respect too that I cannot say I think, because this is a thinking that is still utterly sealed off, that is to say, ultimately enigmatic.

The real's distinction from reality is something that I am not sure merges with what I shall call the proper value that I ascribe to the term real. Since the real is devoid of meaning, I'm not sure whether the meaning of this real might not be clarified when it is held to be nothing less than a sinthome.

This is how I'm replying to the question that has been put to me.

I believe that I am able to support what is at issue by means of a rough-and-ready topology, and what is at issue is the very function of the real, which I set apart from what I believe I am able to hold with certainty to be the unconscious. With certainty, because I am practised – am I not? – in the latter. It is to the extent that the unconscious is not without reference to the body that I think that the function of the real can be set apart from it.

I do think that the psychoanalyst cannot be conceived of otherwise than as a sinthome. Psychoanalysis is not the sinthome, the psychoanalyst is. This is how I reply to what's been put to me by way of a question.

– According to Genesis, as translated by André Chouraqui – I'm reading you the things that people have been good enough to write down for me, which is no worse than anything else, given what I said about the real abiding by writing – God created for man une aide contre lui, a helpmeet against him. What about the psychoanalyst as a helpmeet against?

The psychoanalyst is a helpmeet that may be said to be a reversal in the terms of Genesis, since the Other of the Other too is what I defined just a moment ago as a little hole. That this little hole should be able all by itself to form a helpmeet is precisely where the hypothesis of the unconscious finds its support.

The hypothesis of the unconscious, and Freud underscores this, is something that can only hold up by presupposing the Name-of-the-Father. Presupposing the Name-of-the-Father, which is certainly God, is how psychoanalysis, when it succeeds, proves that the Name-of-the-Father can just as well be bypassed. One can just as well bypass it, on the condition that one make use of it.

– Isn't each speech act, the exploit of one particular unconscious, a collectivization of the unconscious?

If each speech act is the exploit of one particular unconscious then it is absolutely clear, as the theory has shown, that each speech act may stand a hope of being a fact of saying. Moreover, this fact of saying ends up in what there is a theory for, the theory that supports every kind of revolution, namely the theory of contradiction.

One can say things of very great diversity, each thing being on any given occasion a contradiction. But that a reality that is presumed to be revolutionary should emerge from this is very precisely what has never been proven. I mean that just because there might be some contradictory hullabaloo, it doesn't mean that anything like a constituent of reality should ever have arisen from it. One hopes that a reality shall arise from it, but this is just what has never materialized as such.

– What limits do you set to the fields of metaphor?

That's a very good question. Just because the straight line is infinite, it doesn't mean that it's limitless. Indeed, the question continues – Are the fields of metaphor infinite, like the straight line for instance?

It's quite certain that the status of the straight line deserves to be reflected on. The fact that a straight line is assuredly finite when it is cut, on account of having limits, does not mean that an infinite straight line is limitless. Just because a finite line has limits, it doesn't mean that an infinite straight line suffices when it comes to metaphorizing the infinite, since an infinite straight line may be supposed to have what is known as a point at infinity, that is, it may be supposed to form a circle.

The question that the straight line poses is precisely the following – that the straight line is not straight. The ray of light might seem to afford us an image of the straight line, but everyone knows, as seems to be the case going by the latest news from Einstein, it has to be reckoned to be flexible. The light ray bends, even though it does give every appearance of realizing the straight line of this limited scope of ours.

How are we to form some conception of a straight line that, on certain occasions, bends? This is evidently a problem that is raised by my question of the real. This question im-plies in some way that one can ask questions, my goodness, like the one Lenin asked. It is expressly said that a straight line may be curved. He im-ply-cated this in his metaphor that supposes that a stick – a stick being, roughly speaking, the image of a straight line – simply by virtue of being a stick, can be bent and, by the same token, is capable of being straightened.

What is the meaning of this straightening in relation to the use that we can make of it in the Borromean knot with two straight lines? What might the definition of the straight line be beyond the support of what is called – with limited scope – the light ray? There is no other support for it besides what is known as the shortest path from one point to another. But how is one to know what the shortest path from one point to another is?

– I keep expecting you to play on the equivoques. You have said Y a d'l'Un, you've spoken to us about the real as impossible, but you haven't drafted in Un-possible. In relation to Joyce you have spoken about imposed words, but you haven't drafted in the Name-of-the-Father as Un-posé.

This one is signed. Who is it that keeps expecting me to play on blessed equivoques? I'm not especially keen on doing so. It seems to me that I demystify them. It's quite certain that I'm in a considerable bind with this Un, this One. I don't know what to do with it, because the One is not a number, as everybody knows, and as I have stressed on occasion.

I speak of the real as impossible to the extent that I believe, precisely, that the real – well, I believe, if this is my symptom, then pray tell me so – it really has to be said, the real is lawless. The true real implies the absence of any law. The real has no order. This is what I mean when I say that the only thing that I might one day manage to spell out here in front of you is something that has to do with what I called an odd or end of the real.

– What do you make of the contradictory hullabaloo that's been going on for a few years now in China?

I've been waiting, but I don't hope for anything.

– A point is defined as the intersection of three planes. Can one say that it is real? In setting down traits in writing, as an alignment of points, are these points real, in the sense that you understand it?

It is written here au sens que vous l'entendez. No, there's nothing to laugh at. This is a question that absolutely deserves to be asked. A point is defined as the intersection of three planes. Can one say that it's real?

The im-ply-cation of what I have been calling the Borromean link is that amid everything that is consistent in this link there is no common point. This im-ply-cation certainly excludes the point as such from the real. That a figuration of the real should be able to be supported only by the hypothesis that there is no common point, no branching, no Y in writing, certainly implies that the real does not entail the point as such. I am very grateful for this question.

– Does the constant number that you've been speaking about bear any relation to the phallus or the phallic function?

I think that – well, I think, I do think nevertheless that my thought is more than a symptom – that the phallus absolutely cannot be a sufficient support for what Freud conceived of as energetics. Furthermore, what is altogether striking is that Freud himself never identified it.

Someone's written to me in Chinese, which is really very nice. No, in Japanese, I mean that I recognize the small characters. I should very much like the person who sent me this text to translate it for me.

– Are you an anarchist?

Certainly not.

– What might the status be of a response given to a lucubration on the basis of which it would be defined as a sinthome?

Earlier I mentioned a lucubration which is the lucubration of the unconscious. You surely noticed that I had to bring the sinthome down a peg in order to consider it to be homogenous with the lucubration of the unconscious. I mean that the sinthome was figured as being tied to the unconscious in a knot. What I supposed earlier was that I was reducing the sinthome, which is here, to something that corresponds not to the lucubration of the unconscious but to the reality of the unconscious. It's quite certain that, even in this form, this implies a third term, one that keeps these two rings of string apart.

The link between the sinthome and the unconscious, maintained by the body

This third term can be whatever you like, but if the sinthome is considered to be equivalent to the real, on this occasion the third term can only be the imaginary. After all, one can repeat Freud's theory by making this imaginary, to wit, the body, everything that holds the two apart – the two of the set that I have formed here by means of a knot between the symptom and the symbolic.

I thank you for having sent me your questions, apart from this one – Is your twisted cigar a symptom of your real?

It certainly is. My twisted cigar bears the strictest possible relation to the question that I posed about the equally twisted straight line of the same name.

13 April 1976

BY WAY OF CONCLUSION

X

THE WRITING OF THE EGO

What philosophy lacks, and what makes up for it
On a logic of bags and cords
Disentangling oneself from the idea of eternity
On a body dropped like a fruit peel
What Joyce's knot lacks, and what rectifies it

Last time, I confided in you that the strike suited me just fine. I hadn't the faintest inclination to tell you anything whatsoever, because I was in a pickle.

Can you hear me? I'm not going to speak very loudly. Is this microphone on? It would be quite easy for me to find some other pretext, like this microphone not working, for instance – not that this time I don't have something to tell you.

Last time, I was too tangled up in my knots and Joyce to have the slightest inclination to speak to you about it. I was in a pickle, but now I am a little less so, because I think I've found a few transmissible items.

Evidently I've been rather active. Difficulty spurs me on, such that I've been toiling away throughout all my weekends racking my brains over something that doesn't go without saying – since my having found the so-called Borromean knot does not go without saying.

1

All told, I'm trying to force things. Indeed, Joyce didn't have the faintest idea about the Borromean knot.

Not that he didn't make use of the circle and the cross. Indeed, some even speak about nothing but that in his regard. A certain Clive Hart, an eminent mind who has devoted himself to commentaries on Joyce, makes a great deal of this and makes extensive use of it in the book he titled Structure and Motif. . . in James Joyce, but most especially . . . in Finnegans Wake.

The first thing I can tell you is that the expression That takes some doing! is very now. I mean that it has never been uttered to such an extent. And this becomes lodged quite naturally in the fashioning of the knot – it takes some doing.

What does it mean, it takes some doing? It amounts to setting it down in written form. The curious thing is that this knot is an appui, a prop, for la pensée, for pondering. I'm going to let myself illustrate this with a term that allows pondering to be written differently. I'll have to write it down on this little sheet of paper – appui à l'appensée, a prop for appondering.

This knot is a support for pondering but, curiously enough, in order to get something out of it you've got to set it down on a page. Meanwhile, when you merely ponder it, it's not easy to form a representation of this Borromean link – because in reality it's a link and not a knot – even the most straightforward representation. It's not easy to visualize it functioning. This knot, the Node Bo, carries with it the fact that it has to be set down in written form to see how it functions.

Calling it Node Bo makes one think of something that is evoked somewhere in Joyce's writing – atop Mount Nebo the Law was given to us.

So, a writing is a fashioning that gives support to pondering.

Truth be told, the Node Bo in question completely changes the sense of writing. It affords this writing an autonomy, one that is all the more remarkable given that there is another form of writing, one that results from what one might call a precipitation of the signifier. Derrida has insisted on this form of writing, but it's quite clear that I showed him the way, as is already indicated amply by the fact that I didn't find anything else to support the signifier besides writing a capital S.

What remains, however, is that the signifier, that is to say, that which is modulated in the voice, has nothing to do with writing. This in any case is what is demonstrated perfectly by my Node Bo, and this changes the sense of writing. It shows that there is something to which one can fasten signifiers. How, then, does one fasten these signifiers to it? Well, through the intermediary of what I call dit-mension.

Once again, because I'm not altogether sure that this hasn't escaped your notice, I'm going to write it down – mension du dit, the mention of what is said.

This way of writing has one advantage, which is that it enables mension to be extended into mensionge, into mendation, which indicates that what is said is on no account necessarily true.

In other words, what is said in what is known as philosophy is not without a certain lack, which I try to make up for by turning to what cannot help – in the Node Bo – but be set down in written form, so that one may draw some benefit from it.

It's still the case that the φιλία that is there in the φιλέω that the word philosophy starts with can become fairly weighty. Φιλία is time in so far as it is thought. Not thought as in thinking, but thought as in pondered – pondered time. That's what φιλία is.

I'm allowing myself to posit that writing changes the sense, the mode, of what is at stake, namely the φιλία of wisdom. It's not terribly easy to support wisdom otherwise than through writing, the writing of the Node Bo, such that all in all, please excuse my infatuation, what I've been trying to do with my Node Bo is nothing less than the first ever philosophy that, to my eye, stands up.

Simply introducing these Bo Nodes gives an idea of how they support an osseous matter, which in turn is sufficiently suggestive of something that on this occasion I shall call the osbject.

This is indeed what characterizes the letter that I match to this osbject, namely the letter a. I reduce the osbject to this lowercase a precisely in order to indicate that the letter does no more than testify, occasionally, to the intrusion of a form of writing as autre with a lowercase a, as other.

The writing in question comes from somewhere other than the signifier. It really has been some time now that I've been taking an interest in this business of writing, which I promoted the first time I spoke of the unary trait, Freud's einziger Zug.

By virtue of the Borromean knot, I have given this unary trait another support. I haven't yet brought this other support out into the open. In my notes, I've written it DI. These are the initials of droite infinie, the straight line stretching to infinity.

This is not the first time you've heard me speak about the infinite straight line, which I characterize through its equivalence to the circle. This is the principle of the Borromean knot. By combining two straight lines with the circle, you obtain the crux of the Borromean knot. Why does the infinite straight line possess this virtue, or this quality? Well, because it's the best illustration of the hole there is, better than the circle.

Topology indicates to us that there is a hole in the middle of a circle. One sets about dreaming up whatever it is that might constitute the centre, which extends into all kinds of effects of vocabulary, a nerve centre, for example. No one knows exactly what nerve centre means. The infinite straight line possesses the virtue of having the hole all around it. It's the simplest support for the hole.

If we refer to practice, what does this provide us with?

Man, and not God, is a trinitarian composite.

Composed of what? Well, of what we call elements.

What is an element? An element is, on the one hand, that which makes one – in other words, the unary trait – and that which, by virtue of making one, initiates substitution. The characteristic of an element is that you proceed to a combinatory of elements.

Real, imaginary, and symbolic strikes me as just as valid as the other triad from which, going by Aristotle, the juice was extracted to compose man, namely, νοῦς, ψυχή, and σῶμα, or otherwise, will, intelligence, and affectivity.

What I've been trying to introduce through the writing of the knot is nothing less than what I shall call a logic of bags and cords.

Evidently there is the bag, the myth of which, if I may say so, consists in the sphere, but it would seem that no one has reflected sufficiently on the consequences of introducing the cord. The cord proves that a bag is only closed once it has been tied. In any sphere we really need to imagine something that, of course, is at every point of the sphere, that tethers it – this thing into which one blows – by means of a cord.

I'm going to speak to you about Joyce's childhood memories, because I need to show you how this logic of bags and cords can help us to understand how Joyce functioned as a writer.

2

People write down their childhood memories. This has consequences. It's a passage from one kind of writing to another.

Psychoanalysis is something else. It passes by way of a certain number of utterances. No one says that psychoanalysis puts one on the path to writing. What I'm trying to inculcate through my language is that when someone asks you, in the name of I know not what inhibition, to be put in the position of writing, it deserves to be looked at a second time. I for one take a second look when it happens to me, as it does to everybody, that someone should come to ask me this, because it's by no means a clear-cut thing that one would manage to remove such an inhibition with psychoanalysis. This presupposes an investigation, strictly speaking, into what it means to write.

What I'm going to suggest for you today concerns very specifically what this means for Joyce.

I got it into my bonce – a bonce that is far from being spherical on this occasion because it is attached to all that is known – that something happened to Joyce by way of a path that I believe I am able to account for.

Something happened to him that made what is commonly called the Ego play a role that for him was altogether different from the simple role – a role that one imagines to oneself is simple – that it plays in the common run of those who are quite rightly termed mortals. The Ego fulfilled a function for him that I can only account for through my mode of writing.

It is well worth taking the trouble of pointing out what it was that put me on this path. It is that writing is utterly essential to his Ego.

He illustrated this when he met some Tom Fool who went to interview him. I haven't found his name in the Ellmann biography, which is surely the most careful of the biographies on Joyce. It might be in the Gorman one. I'm not saying it's not in the Ellmann, but I didn't have time to look it up this morning. The episode is a well-known one, and one or other of the Joyce biographies mentions it.

So, someone went to see him one day and while there asked him about a picture that depicted a view of the town of Cork. Joyce, who knew how to head his man off at the pass, replied that it was Cork. Whereupon the fellow said – Yes, I see it's Cork. But what's that framing the image? To which Joyce replied – cork.

This is given as an illustration of the fact that in what he writes Joyce always goes via this relationship with framing. You just have to read the little table of points of correspondence that he provided for Ulysses. He gave it to Stuart Gilbert, he gave it to Linati too, albeit a slightly different one, and to a few others, including Valery Larbaud. In each thing he gathers up, each thing he recounts in order to turn it into the work of art that Ulysses is, the framing always bears at least a homonymic relationship with what he is presumed to be recounting as an image. For example, each of the chapters in Ulysses claims to be supported by a certain mode of framing, which is called, for example, dialectic, or rhetoric, or theology. For Joyce, this framing is linked to the very stuff of what he recounts. This is not without producing an evocation of my little rings, which are also the support of a framing.

The question is as follows – what happens when something occurs to someone following on from a fault?

Such a fault is not conditioned by mere chance. Indeed, psychoanalysis teaches us that a fault never occurs by chance. Behind any lapsus, to call it by its name, there lies a signifying finality. If there is an unconscious, a fault tends to want to express something, which is not only that the subject knows, because the subject resides in the very division that I represented for you in its time by one signifier's relationship with another one.

The fault expresses the life of language, life being utterly different for language from what is simply called life. What signifies death for the somatic support has just as much place as life in the drives that fall within the remit of what I've just called vie de langage[1]. The drives in question fall within the remit of the relationship with the body, and in no man is the relationship with the body a straightforward relationship – aside from the fact that the body has a few holes. According to Freud, this is even what must surely have put man on the path of those abstract holes that have to do with the enunciating of anything whatsoever.

This reference suggests that one needs to try to disentangle oneself from the idea of eternity. It's an essentially confused idea, which attaches only to pondered time – the φιλία I was speaking about earlier. People ponder an eternal love, and it even happens that people speak about it indiscriminately, without knowing in the slightest what they are saying, because by that they mean the other life, if I may so express it. You can see how all this gets under way, and where this idea of eternity leads us. No one knows what it is.

As far as Joyce is concerned, I could have read you what he confides to us in A Portrait of the Artist as a Young Man.

With regard to Tennyson, to Byron, to things that refer to poets, it so happened that some classmates pinioned him up against a barbed-wire fence and give him a hiding. The classmate who leads the whole escapade was a certain Heron, which is not an entirely inconsequential term. It's the ἐρῶν. So, this Heron beat him for a time with the help of a few other classmates.

After the escapade, Joyce wonders how it is that, once the thing was over, he bore no malice to him. He expresses himself in an exceedingly pertinent manner, as one may expect from him, I mean that he metaphorizes his relationship with his body. He observes that the whole business was divested of, like a fruit peel.

What does this indicate to us? Well, something that in Joyce has to do with his relationship with his body, a relationship that is already such an imperfect relationship in all human beings.

Who knows what happens in one's body? This is something extraordinarily suggestive. For some, this is even the meaning that they give to the unconscious. If, however, there is one thing that I've been carefully articulating from the start, it's that the unconscious has nothing to do with the fact that one is unaware of a whole load of things related to one's body. As for what one does know, that is of an entirely different nature. We know things that fall within the remit of the signifier.

The old notion of the unconscious, the Unerkannt, drew precisely on our ignorance of what happens in our bodies. Freud's unconscious is the relationship that exists between a body that is foreign to us and something that forms a circle, even a straight line stretching to infinity, and which is the unconscious, these two things being, either way, equivalent to one another.

So, what meaning is to be given to what Joyce gives us an account of?

It's not simply a matter of his relationship with his body, but, if I may say so, the psychology of this relationship. After all, psychology is nothing else but the confused image that we have of our body, but this confused image is not without entailing affects, to call a spade a spade. It is precisely in imagining this psychical relationship that something of the psyche is affected, that it reacts, and that it is not detached, in contrast to what Joyce testifies to after having received the strikes of the cane from his four or five classmates. In Joyce, there is only something that asks simply to take its leave, to be divested of like a fruit peel.

That there are some people who don't feel any affect when violence is done to their body is something curious. Moreover, this is a thing that is ambiguous – perhaps it brought him pleasure, masochism not being excluded in the slightest from Joyce's possibilities of sexual stimulation. He insisted enough on this point with Bloom. I would say, however, that what is striking are the metaphors he employs, namely the detachment of something just as peel is detached. This time he didn't derive any jouissance from it. He had a reaction of disgust. This is something that is valid, psychologically speaking. In sum, this disgust has to do with his own body. It's like someone placing something between parentheses, chasing away a bad memory.

To have a relationship with one's own body as though it were foreign is certainly a possibility, one that is expressed by the use of the verb to have. One has one's body. To no extent is it something that one is. This is what makes one believe in the soul, and there is no reason to stop there. So, one thinks that one has a soul, which really tops it all. The form that this dropping of the relationship with the body takes for Joyce is, however, altogether suspicious for an analyst. This idea of the self, the self as a body, carries weight. This is what is called the Ego.

The Ego is said to be narcissistic because, at a certain level, there is something that supports the body as an image. In the case of Joyce, however, isn't the fact that the image is not involved on this occasion the sign that the Ego has an extremely particular function for him? And how is this to be set down in my Node Bo?

Here, I'm moving into something that you're not obliged to follow.

How far does père-version extend? You know how I spell it.

The Node Bo is the inevitable consequence of the fact that Freud makes everything hold together through the function of the father.

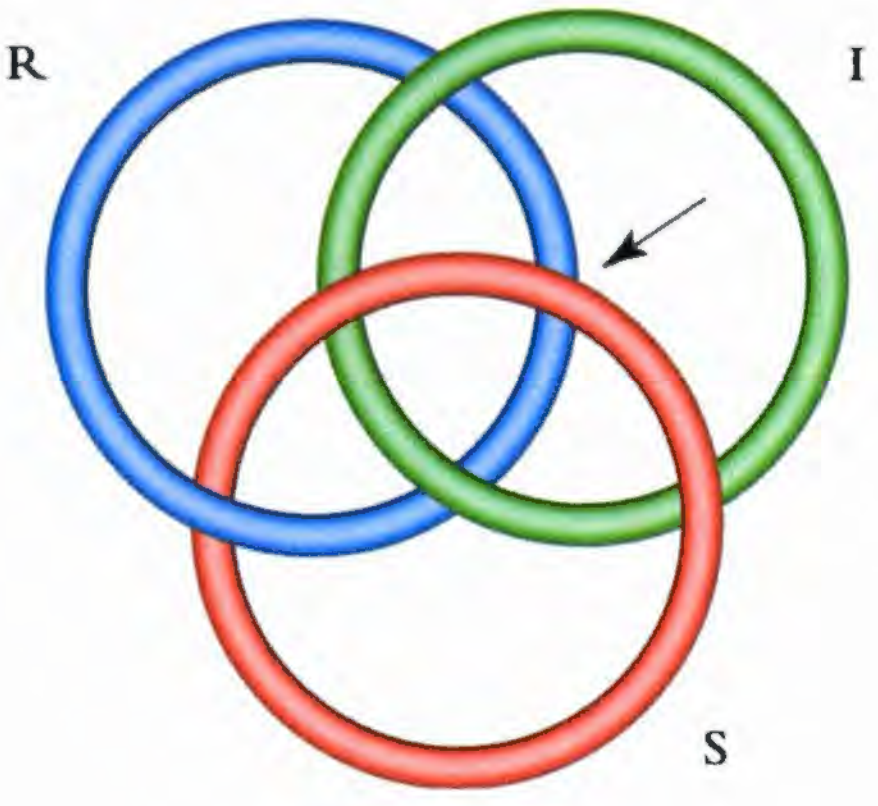
The Node Bo is merely the translation of the following, which I was reminded of yesterday evening – love, and into the bargain the love that one may qualify as eternal, is addressed to the function of the father, in the name of the fact that he is the bearer of castration. This at least is what Freud puts forward in Totem and Taboo through his reference to the primal horde. The sons love the father to the very extent that they are deprived of women.

This is something utterly singular and mind-boggling, which only Freud's intuition sanctions.

I've been trying to flesh out this intuition in a different way with my Node Bo, which is so very apt to evoke Mount Nebo or, as they say, the Law – Law which has absolutely nothing to do with the laws of the real world, these laws being moreover a matter that remains completely open. The Law at issue on this occasion is simply the law of love, that is to say, père-version.

It's very curious that learning to write, at the very least learning to set down my Node Bo in written form, comes in handy. I shall illustrate this for you right away.

Suppose that somewhere, namely at this spot here, there is a mistake, namely that these little breaks mean that there is a fault. Suppose that at the spot I'm indicating here, the third ring passes over the capital R ring instead of underneath. What result does this have?



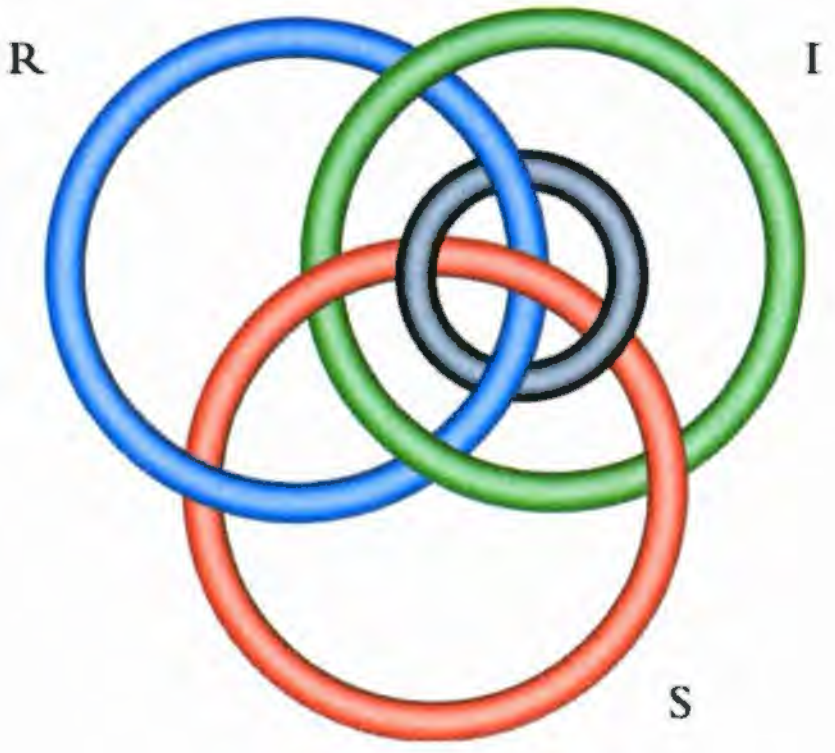
The botched link

All that remains to this capital I is for it simply to clear off. It slides away, in just the same way as what Joyce feels after his hiding. It slides, and the imaginary relationship has no locus. Moreover, this gives one to think that if Joyce was so very interested in perversion, it might have been for another reason. Perhaps, after all, the hiding did disgust him. Perhaps he wasn't a true pervert.

Why is Joyce so unreadable? We must indeed endeavour to imagine why this is so. It might be because he doesn't stir any sympathy in us. But mightn't something be suggested in this affair of ours by the fact, the patent fact, that he has an Ego of a quite different nature?

At the time of his revolt – because it's a fact that he does manage to break away – precisely, this Ego is not functioning, not immediately, just after the said revolt. But after this, I would say that he no longer displays to anyone whatsoever any acknowledgement of having received this hiding.

Look at the link. Nothing could be more commonly imagined than this mistake, this fault, this lapsus. Why shouldn't it happen that a knot should fail to be Borromean, that it should be botched? I've made umpteen thousand mistakes drawing it up here on the board. Well, what I am now going to suppose is the rectification of this mistake.



The rectifying Ego^2

You can see exactly what happens here, where I'm incarnating the Ego as rectifying the wanting relationship, namely what, in the case of Joyce, does not tie the imaginary in a Borromean fashion to the link between the real and the unconscious. Through this artifice of writing, I would say that the Borromean knot is restored.

You see, it's not a face, but a string. Common geometry, from which the word face comes, is about things that play out across faces. Polyhedra are replete with faces, edges and corners. The knot, however, which on this occasion is a link, introduces us to an utterly different dimension which, unlike the evidence of the geometric face, is évidé, emptied out. And precisely because it's évidé, it's not evident.

There is someone who once asked in my regard – Why doesn't he say the truth about truth? He doesn't say the truth about truth because to say the truth about truth is to say that it's a lie.

The intensional truth – here I'll allow myself to spell it intension, which I have already distinguished from the word extension – can once in a while touch upon something real. But that, as it happens, is by chance.

One scarcely imagines the extent of botches that are made in writing. The lapsus calami is not primary in relation to the lapsus linguae, but it may be conceived as a touching upon the real.

I am well aware that my knot is that by which, and uniquely that by which, the real is introduced as such. Don't get worked up, it doesn't go very far. I'm the only one who's picked up on how to handle it, but I'll just as well make use of it, for this will help me to explain something to you. One can very well tolerate, since this is the situation you're in, my fooling around with my feeble means, but it's a way of spelling out the following – all human sexuality is perverse if we carefully follow what Freud says. He never managed to conceive of sexuality except as something perverse, and this is precisely why I question the fruitfulness of psychoanalysis.

You've often heard me state that psychoanalysis hasn't even been bloody capable of inventing a new perversion. It's sad. If perversion is the essence of man, what a fruitless practice this is. Well, I think that, thanks to Joyce, we touch upon something I hadn't thought of.

I didn't think of it straightaway, but it occurred to me in time. Joyce's text is fashioned just like a Borromean knot. And what strikes me is that he's the only one whose notice this escaped. There's not the faintest trace in his whole life's work of anything that looks like one. This seems to me, however, to be more of a sign of authenticity.

When one reads Joyce's text, and above all his commentators, what's striking is the number of riddles it contains. Not only do they abound, but one may say that Joyce played on this, knowing full well that there would be Joyceans for two or three hundred years to come. These are fellows who are kept busy exclusively by solving these riddles. At a minimal level, this consists in wondering why Joyce put such and such a thing here or there. Naturally, they always find a reason why. He put it there because, just after, there's another word. In short, it's exactly like my business of osbject, mendation, dit-mention, and all the rest. I have my reasons. I want to express something, I equivocate, whereas with Joyce, it's all Greek to us, and all the more so given that he knew a bit of Greek.

Fortunately, there was a time when I took an interest in the enigma of the riddle. I write it E_e, capital E subscript e. At issue here is the Enunciation and the énoncé, the statement. The enigma consists in the relationship between the capital E and the lowercase e. It's a matter of finding out why the devil any such statement has been uttered. It's a matter of enunciation, and the enunciation is the enigma.

The enigma raised to the power of writing is something that deserves to give us pause. Might not this join that is so poorly made give rise to the consequence that it is an Ego of enigmatic functions, of reparatory functions?

That Joyce is the writer of the enigma par excellence is something that, were it not so late, I could have quoted countless examples of. I urge you to go and check for yourselves. Ulysses exists in French translation. It can be found in a Gallimard edition, if you don't have the old volume from the time of Sylvia Beach.

4

Even so, before I leave you I shall point out a few small items that seem to me to be noteworthy.

The first point is that you really must realize that what I've told you about man's relations with his body hinges entirely on the fact that man says that the body, his body, is something he has. Just saying his means that he owns it, like a piece of furniture, of course. This has nothing to do with anything that allows the subject to be defined in any strict sense. The subject can be defined in a correct way only through that which forms a relation, through that which means that a subject is a signifier inasmuch as he is represented alongside another signifier.

Here I would like to make a remark that might just keep in check a little something that forms a gulf in what the use of this Borromean knot, this père-version, allows us to clasp. There is something that one may be quite surprised not to see serving the body as such even more, and that is dance. This would allow us to write the term con-dansation a little differently.

Another question. Is the real straight? I should like to point out to you that in Freud's theory the real has nothing to do with the world. What he explains to us with something that has to do precisely with the Ego, namely the Lust-Ich, is that there is a phase of primary narcissism. Primary narcissism is characterized, not by there not being any subject, but by the fact that there is no relationship of inside to outside.

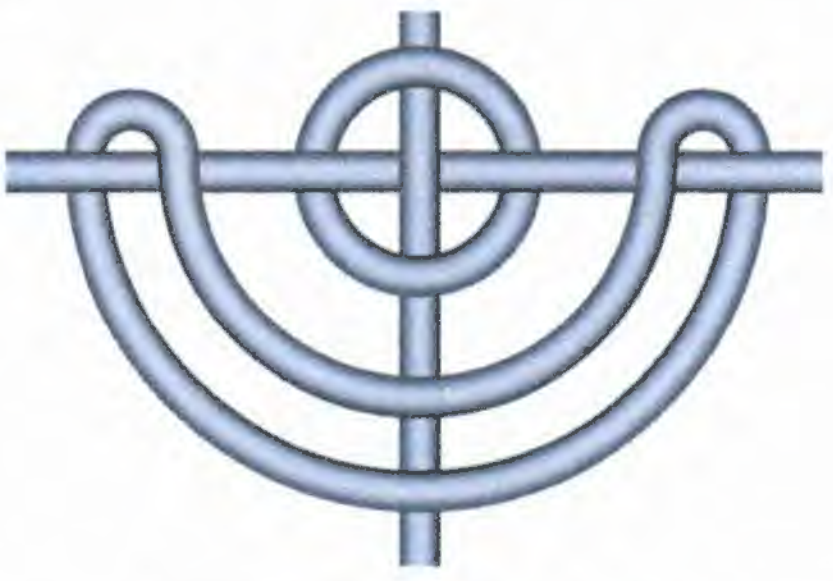
I shall surely have to go back over this. I'm not saying that I will do so here in front of you, because it's by no means certain as things currently stand that I shall still have this lecture theatre at my disposal next year. But let's suppose that I find, somewhere, a place of two hundred square feet, well, that will be somewhere for eight people, me included, and that's the best I can wish for.

I must still say a few more words that I prepared on Joyce's famous epiphanies. You find them at every turn.

I ask you to confirm the following. When he sets out a list of them, every single epiphany is invariably characterized by the same thing, which is very precisely the consequence that results from the mistake in the knot, namely, that the unconscious is tied to the real. The fantastic thing is that Joyce himself speaks about this in a way that is no different. It's there for the reading in Joyce that epiphany is what makes it so that, by virtue of the fault, the unconscious and the real are tied together.

There is one last diagram I can draw for you. If this here is the Ego, as I drew it earlier, we find ourselves in a position to see the Borromean knot being restored. The rupture of the Ego sets the imaginary relation free, because it's easy to imagine that the imaginary will just clear off, given that the unconscious incontestably allows it to do so.



Reconstitution of the link

These are a few observations that I wanted to tell you for this last session. One ponders contra a signifier. This is the meaning that I have given to the word l'appensée, appondering. One props oneself contra a signifier in order to think.

There you go. I'm setting you free. There won't be a final session this year. I was counting on the 18th, but since exams start on the 17th, I'll spare you having to move.

11 May 1976

NOTE

In the first appendix the reader will find the lecture to which Lacan refers at the very start of the Seminar, the same that was delivered in June 1975 at the behest of Jacques Aubert to open the Joyce Symposium at the Sorbonne. Lacan later composed a written text under the same title 'Joyce le Symptôme' for the collected proceedings of the Symposium, which I included in the collection of Lacan's Autres écrits (Seuil, 2001, pp. 565–70). A first version of the lecture text, which I established based on notes taken by Éric Laurent, was published in the Freudian magazine L'Âne under the editorship of Judith Miller.

The second appendix is Jacques Aubert's presentation at the Seminar, the text of which has been revised by its author for the present edition.

Lastly, Jacques Aubert, who was at the origin of The Sinthome and who harbours a fond memory of Lacan, has been kind enough to read the entire manuscript and to draft at my request some reading notes that constitute an admirable piece of textual criticism. As both a Joycean and a Lacanian, only he could have provided them. I shall indicate the following books which have been published under his guidance: Joyce avec Lacan, Navarin, 1987; the edition of Joyce's Œuvres in Gallimard's 'Bibliothèque de la Pléiade' collection (where The Sinthome is mentioned in the apparatus criticus); and, in 2004, the new translation of Ulysses (Gallimard).

I hereby acknowledge my gratitude to him.

J.-A. M., 7 January 2005

RETROACTIVE NOTE

Going through the galley-proofs of the reading notes that I requested of Jacques Aubert to supplement my Joycean knowledge, I realized that they highlighted the absence of similar indications bearing on other fields of knowledge that are mentioned or evoked in The Sinthome.

Given the sometimes cryptic character of this Seminar, it occurred to me that it might not be out of the question for the 2005 reader quite legitimately to wish to have some form of reading-aid within arm's reach, and that in this event it would not be unhelpful to provide one. Nevertheless, my aversion to furnishing any critical apparatus that, with the instant gratification it provides, would thereby deprive the reader of the most precious form of knowledge which is only acquired by overcoming perplexity, has led me to try my hand at the 'eftsoon' style behind Jacques Aubert's art (see what Lacan says about this on p. 60, and Aubert's commentary on p. 172.

To avoid delaying publication, I have made do with drawing on my recollections, on the research I have carried out down the years to make this Seminar pass over into written form, and more generally on my practice of teaching Lacan's work, which I labour to elucidate, notably with this published edition in mind, in my courses at the Department of Psychoanalysis at Paris-VIII University.

The audience this has earned me, in yet larger numbers this year, vouches for the renewed interest in Lacanian studies that has effectively been sparked by the latter-day promotion of various methods, as harmful as they are brisk and simple-minded, of induced mental auto-coercion (CBT). The lengths to which this 'orthodoxy' has gone with a view to imposing itself, in conformity with its fundamental nature, in a brazen and authoritarian manner, make this opportunity for clinicians to verse themselves in the writhen and heretical discipline of the sinthome all the more timely. This is why my course of the present year has been devoted to this Seminar. Transcripts of the sessions will be published in La Cause freudienne, the journal of the École de la Cause freudienne (Navarin/Seuil).

In the same spirit, I have had an index of names made, for the first time in the published edition of the Books of the Seminar [in French].[1]

J.-A. M., 17 January 2005

APPENDICES

JOYCE THE SYMPTOM

Jacques Lacan

Lecture delivered on 16 June 1975 in the main lecture theatre of the Sorbonne as the opening address to the 5th International Joyce Symposium

I'm not on top form today, for all sorts of reasons.

With the approval of Jacques Aubert, to whose urging you owe my presence here – Jacques Aubert is an eminent Joycean, and his PhD thesis on Joyce's aesthetics is an eminently commendable work – I have taken Joyce the Symptom as my title.

You will excuse me if I purstiche a short while[1] – it won't go on for long – the Joyce of Finnegans Wake, which is the dream he has bequeathed, set down as an end-point to – what? This is what I should like to try to spell out. This dream sets down the fin to the oeuvre – Fin again – of being unable to do any better.

I'll resume. Why should one seek that the rot by which man protspers – which has the air of to rot in expectation – why should one seek that the drearly broadshit that stuffs us with news items relay my title correctly?[2] Jacques Lacan, they don't have a clue, Jules Lacue would do just as well. Besides, that's the English pronunciation of what in our language we call la queue. Why should they print Joyce the Symptom? Jacques Aubert relayed it to them, so they went and put Jacques the Symbol. Of course, it's all much of a muchness in their eyes.

From the sym that does ptom to the sym that does bol, what can that fairly do to the Bosom of Abraham, where for the nature of the pot-pourrotten it's a dogsbody's life for all eturnity?[3]

I shall emend this, though. Ptom, p'tithomme, the lil' feller still lives, in the language that reckoned it fell to it, alongside other tongues, to ptom the coextensive entity.[4] Because that's what this means.

Take a look at the Bloch and von Wartburg, an etymological dictionary of sturdy stock, and you will read that symptôme was initially spelt sinthome.

Joyce the sinthome forms a homophony with saintliness, which a few people here may recall I televisionized.

If we read the entry in question in the Bloch and von Wartburg a little further, we notice that Rabelais was the one who turned sinthome into symptomate. It's not surprising. He was a doctor and symptom must have already held its place in medical language, though it's not for sure. If I continue in this same vein I shall say that he symptraumatizes something.

The important thing for me is not to do a pastiche of Finnegans Wake – one would always be beneath the task – but to say in what respect, by formulating the title Joyce the Symptom, I endue Joyce with nothing less than his proper name, the one in which I believe he would have recognized himself within the dimension of naming.

This is a supposition. He would have recognized himself if only I were still able to speak to him today. He would be in his hundreds, which is not the done thing.[5] It's not the done thing to pursue life to such lengths. It would be a strange adherence.

Meeting

Coming from a fairly sordid background, Stanislas to mention it by name – I had a clerical upbringing, as did Joyce, but the priests were less serious than his, Jesuits, and God knows what he was able to make of that – in short, emerging from this sordid background, it so happens that at seventeen, thanks to the fact that I used to drop by Adrienne Monnier's shop, I met Joyce. So too did I attend, when I was twenty, the first reading of the French translation of Ulysses that came out.

Such are the happenstances that drive us from pillar to post, and from which we shape our destiny, for we are the ones who weave it thus. We shape our own destiny from them because we speak. We believe we say what we want, but it's what the others wanted, more particularly our family, qui nous parle. You should hear this nous as a direct object. We are spoken, and, because of this, from the happenstances that drive us, we form something textured.

Indeed, there is a texture – we call it our destiny. Such that it is surely not happenstance, though it would be hard to pick up the thread, that I met James Joyce in Paris while he was still here, for a brief spell more.

Pardon me for telling my tale, but I think I'm doing it only in homage to James Joyce.

Academia and analysis

Throughout my existence, as errant an existence as anyone's, I have always carted around a vast quantity of books – there's a stack about so high – in which those by Joyce only go up to here – the rest are books on Joyce.

Once in a while I would peruse one of them, but of late I've been dabbling in this a great deal more, as Jacques Aubert will testify. I have been able to make out more than mere differences. There is a peculiar wavering in how Joyce is received, which depends of course on the angle from which he is taken.

In conformity with what Joyce himself knew would befall him posthumously, not only do academics dominate, they are pretty much the only ones to busy themselves with Joyce. This is altogether striking.

Joyce said as much – What I write will go on and on producing work for academics. He hoped for nothing less than to keep them busy till the university is no more. It has certainly been carving out a path. And it's quite clear that this has only been able to come about because Joyce's text is teeming with utterly captivating problems, fascinating problems that academics can get their teeth into.

I'm no academic, contrary to what is thrust upon me by way of professor, mentor, and other dalliance. I'm an analyst. This produces immediate homophony, does it not, with the four Master Annalists whom Joyce makes so much of in Finnegans Wake, who laid the foundations of Ireland's annals. I belong to another species of analyst.

It cannot be said that Joyce was particularly enthralled by the analysis that emerged thereafter. Authors in whom we may put our faith, who knew Joyce well – I merely caught a glimpse of him – who were friends of his, readily suggest that while he freudened this fredonnement, it was with repugnance. I believe this to be true.

I think this is borne out by the fact that in the constellation of the dream from which one never awakens, in spite of the last word, Wake, in the texture of characters in Finnegans Wake, there are the two twins, Shem – whom you'll allow me to call Shemptom – and Shaun.

That is how they are pronounced, at least I hope so because this time I didn't consult Jacques Aubert, who has supported me so terribly well throughout this brewing process.

So, we have Shemptom and Shaun. They are knotted together. Nothing could be more tightly knotted than twins. It is to the other one – not to Shem, whom he calls, tacking on a label, the penman – it is to Shaun that Joyce tacks Dr Jones, the analyst to whom Freud entrusted the task of drafting his biography. Freud knew what he was doing. He knew Jones well, which is to say that he was quite sure that Jones wouldn't be in the least bit fanciful, that he wouldn't, among other things, go fishing for the agenbite of inwit. Stephen Dedalus speaks about the agenbite of inwit somewhere in Ulysses, the bite of the ensoi – as it's been translated in French, I don't know why – when really it means wit, inward wit, the bite of the flash of wit, the bite of the unconscious. With Jones, Freud could rest easy. He knew his biography would be a hagiography.

Clearly, that Joyce should Shaunize, if I may say so, the Jones in question is what gives us some idea of the importance, as the other fellow put it, of being Ernest. Jones, much more than did Joyce – I'm telling you this because I met him – sniffed at being called Ernest, but this was undoubtedly because of the play of this name, such an astonishing play, by Wilde, and which Joyce made so big a deal of. This reference to the importance of being called Ernest arises more than once in Finnegans Wake.

A cancelled subscription to the unconscious

The sole import of all this is that it brings us closer to the fact that saying Joyce the sinthome and saying Joyce the symbol are not the same thing.

I'm saying Joyce the Symptom because the symptom, with respect to the symbol, a-bol-ishes it, if I may continue in this same vein. It is not simply Joyce the Symptom, it is Joyce in so far as he has, as it were, cancelled his subscription to the unconscious.

Read Finnegans Wake. You will notice that this is something that is played out not at the level of each line but at the level of every single word. It plays on the pun, a highly particular punning. Read it. Every single word is put together like the first words by which I tried to set the tone, with protsper, made up of three or four words that, through the way they are used, flake apart in sparks. This is undoubtedly fascinating, though truth be told its meaning, in the sense we usually give it, gets lost.

In Structure and Motif in Finnegans Wake, Mr Clive Hart speaks about goodness knows what sense of disappointment in Joyce's use of this type of pun. Mr Atherton, in his book The Books at the Wake, relates this to the unforeseen. Rather, these puns are portmanteau-words in the Lewis Carroll sense, which makes Carroll a precursor. Having come across Carroll rather late in the day, Joyce must surely have found himself – so reports Atherton – somewhat importuned.

Read a few pages of Finnegans Wake without striving to understand it. It's quite readable. It's quite readable, as someone from my circle remarked to me, because one can sense the presence of the jouissance of he that wrote it. One wonders, however – at least the person in question did – why Joyce published it? Why did he eventually bring out, in cold print, this Work that was in Progress for seventeen years?

By good fortune there is just one edition, which means that when one cites it one can quote the right line on the right page, that is, the page that will forever bear the same number. If ever it had to be reprinted with a different pagination, as some other books are, where would one go to get one's bearings?

The fact that he did publish it is what I should hope, were he still here, would let me convince him that he wanted to be Joyce the Symptom, inasmuch as he offers the apparatus, the essence, and the abstraction, of the symptom. If there is one thing that accounts for the fact noted by Clive Hart – that in following him step by step, by the end one finds oneself tired out by it – then it is precisely that this proves how your own symptom, for you like everyone else, is the only thing that holds any interest for you. The symptom in Joyce is a symptom that concerns you in no respect whatsoever. It is the symptom inasmuch as it stands no chance whatsoever of hooking anything of your unconscious. I think this is the meaning behind what was said by the person who asked me about why he published it.

This questioning on his major and final work needs to be continued. It is the work for which Joyce set aside the function of being his escabeau[6], because from the very start he wanted to be someone whose name – very precisely the name – would endure forever. Forever means that it marks a date. No one had ever made literature like that. And to underscore the weightiness of the word literature, I shall utter the equivoque that Joyce often plays on – letter, litter. The letter is litter. Now, were it not for this very special kind of spelling that is specific to the English language, a good three quarters of the effects of Finnegans Wake would be lost.

The most extreme case, I can tell you, and I owe this to Jacques Aubert, is – Who ails tongue coddeau, aspace of dumbillsilly? Had I come across this piece of writing on my own, would I have perceived or not – Où est ton cadeau, espèce d'imbecile? Where's your present, you imbecile?

What is unprecedented in this is that the homophony, translinguistic homophony on this occasion, is sustained only by letters that conform to English-language spelling. You wouldn't know that who can transform into où if you didn't know that who is pronounced that way in the interrogative. There is some kind of ambiguity in this phonetic usage, which I would also spell f.a.u.n. The faunesque aspect of the thing leans squarely upon the letter, namely upon something that is not essential to a tongue, a tongue being something woven by the accidents of history. That someone should make such prodigious use of this enquires, in and of itself, into the very nature of language.

I've said that the unconscious is structured like a language. It's odd that I'm also able to speak in terms of a cancellation of subscription to the unconscious for someone who plays strictly on language, though he did use one particular tongue among others, one that is not his own – for his own is precisely a tongue that had been wiped off the map, to wit, Gaelic, of which he had a smattering, enough to get by, but hardly much more – not his own, then, but the tongue of the invaders, the oppressors.

Joyce said that in Ireland they had one master and one mistress, the former being the imperial British state and the latter the holy Roman catholic and apostolic church, each as baneful as the other. This is precisely what can be seen in what makes of Joyce the Symptom, the pure symptom of what is involved in the relationship to language, in so far as this is reduced to the symptom – namely, to what it produces by way of effect, when one does not analyse this effect – I shall say, furthermore, in so far as one refrains from playing on any of those equivoques that would stir anybody else's unconscious.

Jouissance, not the unconscious

If the reader is fascinated, then it is on account of the fact that, in keeping with this name that echoes the name of Freud – after all, Joyce bears some relation to joy, jouissance when written in lalingua that is English – that this jouasse, this jouissance, is the sole thing in his text on which we can get a purchase. There lies the symptom.

The symptom – in so far as nothing ties it to what makes for lalingua itself, by which this weft is sustained, these stria, these strings in the earth and air with which he opens Chamber Music, his first published book, a chapbook of poems – is purely what is conditioned by lalingua, but in a certain fashion Joyce lifts the symptom to the power of language, without for all that any of it being analysable.

This is what strikes you, and literally renders you interdit, in the sense that means I was rendered speechless.

That one uses the word interdire to say stupefy is something that holds great import. This is what makes for the substance of what Joyce brings us, whereby, in a certain way, literature after him can no longer be what it was before.

It is no accident that Ulysses aspires, that it draws in, a Homeric something or other, even though there isn't the faintest relationship between what happens in Ulysses and what is involved in The Odyssey. Joyce did send some commentators down that path, though, assimilating Telemachus into Stephen Dedalus. People fret over carrying the torch of the commentary on The Odyssey. Moreover, how can it be said that Bloom is in any respect a father for Stephen, who has nothing to do with him save bumping into him now and then in Dublin? Unless Joyce is already indicating, and finds himself denoting, how psychical reality as a whole, which means the symptom, depends in the final analysis on a structure in which the Name-of-the-Father is a non-conditioned element.

The father as a name and as he who names, that's not that same. The father is this fourth element – here I'm evoking something whose deliberation only a part of my audience may have access to – without which nothing is possible in the knot of the symbolic, the imaginary and the real.

There is, however, another term for this. This is where today I'm going to crown what is involved in the Name-of-the-Father, at the very degree to which Joyce bears it out, with what it would be most suitable to call the sinthome.

It is in so far as the unconscious is knotted to the sinthome, which is what is singular to each individual, that we may say that Joyce, as has been written somewhere, identifies with the individual. He is one who has earned the privilege of having reached the extreme point of embodying the symptom in himself, by which he eludes any possible death, on account of being reduced to a structure that is the very structure of LOM, if you will let me spell it quite simply L.O.M.[7] This is how he conveys himself, as something that puts a full stop to a certain number of exercises. He sets down an end point, but how are we to understand the meaning of this end point?

It is striking that Clive Hart should lay the emphasis on the cyclic form and on the cross as being what Joyce substantially attaches himself to. Some of you know that with this circle and this cross I have been tracing out the Borromean knot. Examining Joyce at the level of the product of this knot, namely the ambiguity between 3 and 4, namely that to which he remains stuck, attached, to examining Vico, and things that are worse still, to conversing with spirits – moreover, Atherton files all that under the general heading of spiritualism, which rather surprised me, because thus far I've been calling that Spiritism – it is most certainly surprising to see that this is occasionally a contributing factor in Finnegans Wake in the guise of the symptom.

This is not all, for it's hard not to take into account the fiction that may be placed under the heading of initiation. What is the make-up of all that is conveyed in this register and under this term? How many associations arm themselves with banners whose meaning they do not comprehend? That Joyce delighted in Madame Blavatsky's Isis Unveiled is something I learnt from Atherton and which I found quite staggering. The form of feeble-mindedness that all initiation entails is what hits me at first, and perhaps leads me to underestimate it.

It has to be said that shortly after the time when, thank heavens, I met Joyce, I was to come across a certain René Guénon, who was worth no more than the worst of initiation. Hi han a pas, to be written like the hee-haw of the jackass to which Joyce alludes as the central point of the four terms North, South, East and West, as the intersection of the cross – borne by a jackass, goodness knows Joyce makes enough of this in Finnegans Wake.[8]

Even so, how can Finnegans, this dream, be said to be finished, since already its last word cannot help but join back up with the first, the the by which it ends soliciting the riverrun by which it starts, which indicates circularity? To spell it right out, how did Joyce manage to miss, right here, what I am at present introducing by way of the knot?

In so doing, I am introducing something new which accounts not only for the limitation of the symptom but also for what means that it is by tying itself to the body, i.e. the imaginary, and by thus tying itself to the real, and to the unconscious as a third term, that the symptom takes on its limits. It is because it meets its limits that one can speak in terms of the knot.

The knot is certainly something that can be scrunched up, that can be rolled up into a ball of twine, but which, once unravelled, maintains its knot shape and, by the same token, its ex-sistence.

This is what I am going to allow myself to introduce into my development for the coming year by leaning, among others, on Joyce.

PRESENTATION AT LACAN'S SEMINAR

Jacques Aubert

Delivered on 20 January 1976

Back in June, Dr Lacan announced that Joyce was going to be on his path. The fact that I am here today on no account means that I find myself on this royal road. Let's say straightaway that I'm more on the hard shoulder, and you know in general why the hard shoulders are signposted. So, you are going to be hearing comments that are not so much à la cantonade as à la cantonnier, a road-mender's remarks!

I must thank Jacques Lacan for inviting me to produce a piece of work that would be bâclé, hurried, and not bouclé, complete, that wouldn't be well fashioned, and wouldn't be all that well articulated as far as the knots are concerned. On the other hand, I would like to point out that what I'm about to say starts off from my sense of what is snaking through Joyce's text, through some of Joyce's texts at certain points, something that Joyce wove into them. This awareness of something that snakes in and out has led me not to insist upon what might otherwise produce a definitive piece of work.

To locate the point from which I began, quite by chance, I must specify that it was a short piece from 'Circe' – I'm saying this in an altogether didactic way – a short piece of exchange from this episode of Ulysses that was subsequently called 'Circe', and which is known as the episode of hallucination, whose purported art is 'magic', and whose purported technic is 'hallucination' (according to the table that Joyce drew up for some of his friends).

Elements from earlier chapters crop up again, the status of which it is still too early to assign. They may be characters, true or fictive, objects or signifiers. But what is also interesting is the way they crop up, the way that this clearly has to do with speech, with a word. One realizes this from the very start because I daresay that the first two characters are THE CALLS and THE ANSWERS that mark out a dimension that is developed in the chapter's form through an ostensibly dramatic style of writing. In short, this is a dimension of speech, and a kind of setting up of sites from which it speaks.

The important thing is that it speaks, and this runs all over the place. Moreover, anything and everything can be impersonated, to use a term that we shall be meeting in a little while; everything can personate in this text; everything can be the occasion of effects of the voice through a mask.

It is one of these functions, the detail of one of these functions, a functioning of one of these functions, that I think I have distinguished at the start of the chapter in an exchange between Bloom and the one who is supposed to be his father, Rudolph, who has been dead for eighteen years. I'll read you the brief exchange in question. It can be found on p. 416.[1]

Rudolph has appeared, initially, as an elder of Zion. According to the stage direction he has the face of an elder in Zion. After making a few reproaches to his son, he says this:

> What you making down this place? Have you no soul? [Of Hungarian extraction, he is not supposed to be fully fluent in English.] (With feeble vulture talons he feels the silent face of Bloom.) Are you not my son Leopold, the grandson of Leopold? Are you not my dear son Leopold who left the house of his father and left the god of his fathers Abraham and Jacob?

At first sight, what transpires here for the reader of Ulysses is a phenomenon described on several occasions by Bloom himself with the expression 'retrospective arrangement', an expression that crops up fairly often throughout the text. The reader cannot fail to be sensitive to this retrospective arrangement, nor to the fact that this is an arrangement formed from a favourite quotation of his father's, a literary text that, to all appearances, had certain effects on him. This text is on p. 73:

> Nathan's voice! His son's voice! I hear the voice of Nathan who left his father to die of grief and misery in my arms, who left the house of his father and left the God of his father.

---

[1] In this presentation the reference texts are the 1922 Shakespeare & Co. edition of Ulysses [reprinted with the same pagination by Oxford World's Classics]; and the 1968 Viking edition of A Portrait of the Artist as a Young Man with criticism and notes by C. G. Anderson.

One can see that what repeats is slightly different. But before I isolate the differences, I would like to point out the effects that this different return has on Bloom.

What does he reply in the 'Circe' episode? The following:

> Bloom (With precaution.) I suppose so, father. Mosenthal. All that's left of him.

Here, there appears one of the functions of Bloom, who is described at some length in Ulysses as the cautious one. Caution is one of the aspects of Ulysses himself (though Ulysses is not only that). Bloom is often described in a language that is somewhat Masonic in inspiration: 'the prudent member'. This prudent member says, 'I suppose so' (and not je crois que oui as the first French translation rendered it), rather it is I sub-pose so, or I suppose something in reply to the question, 'Are you not my son?'. It's I sub-pose something of the sort, which in principle refers back to what his father has said, but which all of a sudden takes another turn when we follow the text because we have this stop, marked by what in the US they call a 'period', something that forms a period, a dot that is not a suspension point but a point of suspense. From this point there emerges 'Mosenthal', which is also punctuated with a full stop.

Around this proper name something is articulated and disarticulated at the same time based on the announced sub-position. What, then, is this suppôt, this 'henchman', this sous-pot function, a 'pot saucer' function (or a sous-peau function, an 'under the skin' function) that Mosenthal holds?

Here, in this context, this signifier has the function of referring his father's speech to the author of a text, the text that has just been mentioned by his father. But in its brutality this signifier obscures more than it clarifies, and the reader is led to uncover, to find again, the thoughts to which it refers and the displacements in which it is implicated.

One of these displacements is evident: in the first text, the text of the 'Lotus Eaters' episode (p. 73), the name in question, the name of the author, features before the quote; it is in the signature position here, and also the reply position. This is very seductive, and since it has to do with Moses, it's especially pleasing. But if we bear in mind – as always, because we spend our time re-reading – the place that Mosenthal occupied in the first text, we realize that this was a displaced reply to the question as to the existence of the true name; a question that itself didn't manage to be formulated except in a suggestively vacillating way.

At this point I should write up another sentence, which is precisely the question to which 'Mosenthal' was supposed to reply:

> What is this the right name is? By Mosenthal it is. Rachel, is it? No.

For good measure, I've included the next part, which might hold some interest.

Even though a German speaker who knows the slang might hear something else, especially if it carried a diaeresis, Mosenthal is the name of the author of a theatre play whose original German title Bloom is trying to retrieve and retranslate. In fact the title is a woman's name, a female Jewish name, which wasn't kept in English. It's a curious idea. It's a melodrama that had the title Deborah in German, which was translated into English under the name Leah, and this is what Bloom is trying to find. So, he's trying to translate the original title (which is a woman's name) and this takes the form of this search. Clearly, we can see the game of hide-and-seek between the author's name and the creature's name at the level of art, which brings into play both Being, with insistence – the 'is' insists – and the sexual problematic of a patronymic that comes in the stead of a daughter's name.

At this point the reader, whose notice nothing in Ulysses escapes, of course, says that this rings a bell, which bears some relation with Bloom himself.

I'll give you the first passage again (and I apologize for doing this in bits and pieces but I'm simply following the path I took), along with its context:

> Mr Bloom stood at the corner, his eyes wandering over the multicoloured hoardings. Cantrell and Cochrane's Ginger Ale (Aromatic). Clery's summer sale. No, he's going on straight [This refers to someone he's just been speaking to; Bloom wonders whether he might be watching him]. Hello. Leah tonight [The play in question]: Mrs Bandman Palmer. Like to see her in that again. Hamlet she played last night. Male impersonator.

Here begins a short passage on the problematic of the sexes. The English expression 'male impersonator' refers to an actress who has taken on the male persona, his mask, but on the other hand this can apply as much to the one play, Hamlet, as to the other, Leah. Everything will revolve around this.

> Male impersonator. Perhaps he was a woman. Why Ophelia committed suicide?

So, at a certain level there is the fact that the role of Hamlet was very often played by women. It turns out that one Anglophone critic had the fanciful idea of analysing Hamlet precisely in terms of transvestism, taking the impersonator seriously in some sense and saying: Ophelia committed suicide because she realized that Hamlet was in fact a woman. I'm not mentioning this critic for the sake of it, in the name of my Shakespearian and Joycean knowledge, but simply because this implication appears elsewhere in Ulysses.

The statement 'Why Ophelia committed suicide?' is equivocal. It's both Why did Ophelia commit suicide? and Was this the reason she committed suicide? Clearly this doesn't make it through in the French translation, and it's worthwhile pointing that out.

What do we read next?

> Poor papa! How he used to talk about Kate Bateman in that! Outside the Adelphi in London waited all the afternoon to get in. Year before I was born that was: sixtyfive. And Ristori in Vienna. [And this is where the question about the title comes in.] What is this the right name is? By Mosenthal it is. Rachel, is it? No. The scene he was always talking about where the old blind Abraham recognizes the voice and puts his fingers on his face.
>
> – Nathan's voice! His son's voice! I hear the voice of Nathan who left his father to die of grief and misery in my arms, who left the house of his father and left the God of his father.
>
> Every word is so deep Leopold.
>
> Poor Papa! Poor man! I'm glad. I didn't go into the room to look at his face. That day! O dear! Ffoo! Well, perhaps it was the best for him.

So, in this passage a whole series of questions are at stake: questions about existence; about Being and the name; about existence and suicide; the question of the name – and I shall be coming back to this point – that is in fact both the name of the father, his father, and the name of the main character in the play; and lastly the question about the sex that personates, which is that which père-sonates.

Behind the question of the name stands the suicide of the father, who possesses this further characteristic of having changed name: this is what is indicated in another passage that is likewise presented in a curious way.

In a pub, a few of the barflies are talking about Bloom. 'He's a perverted jew', says one of them. (Here, 'perverted' means 'renegade', in the same way that Joyce uses it towards the end of A Portrait: '[. . .] are you trying to make a convert of me or a pervert of yourself?')

> He's a perverted jew [. . .] from a place in Hungary and it was he drew up all the plans according to the Hungarian system [the political plans of Sinn Fein]. [. . .] He changed it [his name] by deedpoll, the father did. (p. 323)

So, it seems that the father changed his name. Moreover, he changed it in a way that is rather interesting, using a legal form called a deed poll. A 'deed' is an act (in every sense of the term), but 'poll' evokes or describes in some way the act from the point of view of the document: it's a document that has been 'cropped'. This 'poll', which describes the cropping, actually refers to what has been lopped off or affected by pollarding (a tree that has had its upper part removed is referred to as a 'pollard'). In fact, 'poll' refers to the top of the head. The deed poll has the characteristic of only comprising one part, the lower part. This is why in the French translation it says par décret. This is distinct from indenture where the act is torn in two, precisely by indentation, in order to be entrusted to the two parties. Therefore, so Joyce tells us, the father changed name by deed poll, by a procedure that is different from a symbolic one. But what name did he change?

> – Isn't he a cousin of Bloom the dentist? says Jack Power.
> – Not at all, says Martin. Only namesakes. His name was Virag. The father's name that poisoned himself.

In this we can hear a play on the genitive and on the position of the name of the father, which allows one to understand that it was the name that poisoned itself.

'Virag' appears again. It is mentioned in several places in Ulysses. It reappears in 'Circe', where first it is a virago, designated as such: VIRAGO. Here we may remind ourselves just what 'virago' is, namely the name that in the Vulgate, in Saint Jerome's translation of the Bible, serves to designate woman from Adam's point of view. In Genesis, man is led to name woman: thou shalt be called woman [Virago]. She is a little bit male (vir), while still being a woman.

Having come to this point in my lucubration and my groping between the lines of Ulysses, I should like to single out what gives the impression of being a hole in this interlacing. Indeed, it's tempting to use, with a view to interpretation, a schema that brings into play the suicide, the change of name, and Bloom's refusal to see the face of his dead father. It would be very apt if all that were to reappear in 'Circe', in what is deemed to be a hallucination. But this is nowhere near enough, even if there is some truth to it, to make the text function, to account, for example, for the passage, 'Poor Papa! Poor man!' in the first extract (after 'Every word is so deep Leopold'). These words report the father's commentary on the play, and then: 'Poor Papa! Poor man!', which perhaps was not so kind about the father's comments. 'I'm glad. I didn't go into the room to look at his face. That day! O dear! [. . .] Well, perhaps it was the best for him.' In short, there is a whole set of items that need to be accounted for, and above all the effects produced in the dramatic redistribution that 'Circe' comprises. For this holds together, it functions, and things happen precisely alongside something that gives the impression of being a hole. Precisely, Joyce has a knack, among other things, of displacing, if I may say so, the area of the hole in a manner that allows for certain effects.

For example, in the given quotation the son's voice is not mentioned, no more than the father's death. On the other hand, an effect is produced by the son's voice, which is displaced in a reply, but a son's voice that bears a certain savoir-faire about the signifier. This precaution, this ability that is to be supposed, to be sub-posed, can be seen growing in accordance with an altogether suggestive logic. I spoke of the rhetorical suggestiveness of Mosenthal, within periods, articulated in the style of j'en ai marre, marabout . . .[1]: Mosenthal . . . All that . . . all that's left of him. 'All that's left of him' is all that remains of him. But it's also all that's to the left of him, on his left. If one thinks of what the Creed stipulates on the respective places of the Father and the Son on high, this says a great deal about their relations. All that's left of him, a name, an author's name; all that's to the left of him, something therefore that either way is not a true son. Let's stop there.

What's quite sure is that this gives pleasure to Bloom and that this had been understood. And how do we see this? It's because the father is not at all happy. The following retort begins:

> Rudolph (Severely.) – One night they bring you home drunk [. . .].

If you please, no out-of-place humour, let's speak instead about your transgressions. Bloom's jubilation, Bloom who has prudently said what he had to say, and which pleases everyone.

However, within this series of effects, some of which I've just isolated, there is another sort of cascade: another effect develops, which is in some respect structural in relation to the previous effects, a sort of result of the previous effects. This game in relation to the father seems to slide to the side of the mother. The father, who is contested in various ways, leads to a mother on the side of the imaginary.

So, Rudolph has mentioned his son's transgression, when he came home drunk, having spent all his money, and also when he came home covered in mud. 'Nice spectacles for your poor mother!' He wasn't the one who was displeased, it was her!

But the way this comes about, the way it is passed on to the mother by means of the mud, is rather funny: those of you who've read A Portrait of the Artist in English may have noticed that 'mud' is also a familiar term for 'mother'. This gets associated with a pantomime (p. 67 in the Viking edition). It's a little sketch, of the epiphany type (I'm using the term with a little provocation): in one of the first chapters of A Portrait Joyce placed a series of sketches where the child Stephen, young Stephen, is finding his way around in Dublin, based on a certain number of points, scenes, sites, and houses. He is seated in a house (generally the scenes start like that), on a chair, in the kitchen of his aunt who is reading the evening paper and admiring 'the beautiful Mabel Hunter', a beautiful actress. A young girl with ringletted hair approaches > on tiptoe to peer at the picture and said softly:

> – What is she in, mud?
> – In a pantomime, love.

Now, it so happens that the passage from 'Circe' that I was speaking about just now slides into the mud because this signifier, 'mud', comes back three or four times in the passage, sliding from mud to the emergence of the mother: 'Nice spectacles for your poor mother!', says Rudolph, and Bloom says, 'Mamma!', because she is appearing at that very instant. (In 'Circe', as soon as certain words, certain signifiers, are introduced, the object, as it were, comes to the surface.) And in what way? 'In pantomime dame's stringed mobcap, widow Twankey's crinoline and bustle, blouse with muttonleg sleeves', following the logic of English pantomime, that is to say, a man disguised as a woman (these pantomime shows are played in particular around Christmas, and involve generalized cross-dressing: panto-mime).

So, women's dress. But something else resonates here, because at the very start of Ulysses the mother has been mentioned in relation to pantomime (pp. 9–10). Indeed, after having mentioned his dying mother, Stephen says:

> Where now?
> Her secrets: old featherfans, tasselled dancecards, powdered with musk, a gaud of amber beads in her locked drawer. A > birdcage hung in the sunny window of her house when she was a girl. She heard old Royce sing in the pantomime of Turko the Terrible and laughed with others when he sang:

>
> I am the boy
> That can enjoy > Invisibility.
>
> Phantasmal mirth, folded away: muskperfumed.

There appears here a fantasmatic whole that is linked to the mother, through Stephen's stumbling, with a radical ambiguity: what was she laughing at? At old Royce singing? At what he was saying? At the sound of his voice? Goodness knows what else.

It turns out that this mother, this problematic mother, is dressed precisely as the mother in the Aladdin pantomime, Widow Twankey, is dressed. The Widow Twankey blouse is the blouse worn by Aladdin's mother in the pantomimes, a mother who clearly understood nothing of what he was up to, apart from the fact that in rubbing the lamp the genie within was being made to talk.

I shall leave this point here in order to move onto another aspect of the functioning of the text.

Ellen Bloom, who has just emerged, is not at all like the father on the side of the elders of Zion. Rather she sounds like she is on the side of Catholic religion, apostolic and Roman, for what does she say when she sees him all covered in mud?

> O blessed Redeemer, what have they done to him!
> [. . .] Sacred Heart of Mary, where were you at all at all?

This is rather curious because one would have expected the Sacred Heart of Jesus instead. In a certain way, this betrays her narcissistic relation to religion: she is very clearly Catholic, in a way that it was possible to be in the nineteenth century, and this is a dimension that deserves to be noted when one speaks about Joyce, even if one has to go looking in the more benign texts, Stephen Hero and Dubliners: an imaginary relation to religion is ascertained in the mother.

I would like to indicate this first of all in relation to epiphany. What is known as 'epiphany' signifies many things that are fairly diverse. Joyce defined epiphany once only, in Stephen Hero, and of course what he said has been slightly twisted. Here is the definition:

> By an epiphany he meant a sudden spiritual manifestation, whether in the vulgarity of speech or of gesture or in a memorable phase of the mind itself.

This is a definition that is polished, didactic, and redolent of Aquinas. But it is slotted into a text that over two pages takes us from a dialogue with his mother in which she reproaches Stephen for his unbelief – she is constantly mentioning the 'priests' – to Stephen breaking away from her on this issue and, at another level, circumventing the problem. In his discourse he slips from the woman/priest relationship to the beloved. Then, suddenly, he says that he started wandering round the streets, and a Dublin incident that was 'keen enough to afflict his sensitiveness' effectively 'set him composing some ardent verses'. There is no further mention of the poem, but he reports the dialogue he heard, a colloquy between a young lady and a young gentleman. One of the few words that appears is the word 'chapel', a word that in Ireland designates a Catholic church (the churches strictly speaking were occupied by the Anglican church): apart from this word there is precious little but suspension points in the dialogue.

So, this dialogue which, from one angle, doesn't present anything, leads him to write a poem and, from the other angle, he baptizes it and defines it over the following lines, in learnèd fashion, as an 'epiphany'. He adds that what he wanted to do was to record these scenes, these realist and exceedingly suggestive sketches. Therefore, we have a sort of duplication of experience (let's say, in order to simplify things, a realist side and an in some sense poetic side), and a kind of elimination or suppression of the poetic in the text of Stephen Hero. Now, the elided poem was called 'Vilanelle of the Temptress', and it emerged precisely within a certain discourse that involved his mother, his mother in relation to the priests.

This relationship, which I have roughly defined as an imaginary relation to religion, is to be found again in different ways in A Portrait of the Artist, for example with the sermons on hell, which are interminable (both Kantian and very Sadean) and which aim to present in detail the horrible tortures of hell, to give in praesentia an idea of what hell is. Or in another way with the figure of the confessor, who listens but also replies. What does he reply? What does he say? It is precisely around all of this that Stephen's Easter duty revolves, the confession of his turpitude, and also the function of the artist.

Here I shall indicate two passages, from two texts, one that is to be found at the start of Stephen Hero, where Stephen says that in writing verse he was able to 'combine the offices of penitent and confessor'; the other towards the end of A Portrait of the Artist when, mortified at seeing his beloved lending an ear and smiling to a young well-scrubbed priest, he says that he has renounced the priesthood, that the matter is settled, and that he doesn't stand on that side. He adds in so many words that it's fellows like the young priest, whom women confide in, who in turn tell them everything in the half-light, and he says that he would like to be there before she engenders someone of their race, and that the effect of this word should even improve this blasted race a little.

This is perhaps related to the famous 'uncreated conscience' that he speaks about on the last page. It goes by way of the ear, the famous conception through the ear, which moreover we meet in 'Circe'.

Jacques Lacan – And which Jones insisted on a great deal. Jones, Freud's pupil.

Another essential point concerning this imaginary dimension of religion is thrown into relief in the famous passage in Ulysses where there is an opposition between the Trinitarian and problematic conception of theology and an 'Italian' Madonnaizing conception that plugs all the holes with an image of Mary. He says that, indeed, the Catholic Church did rather well in founding everything 'upon the void', 'upon incertitude'. It seems to me that in these texts the names of the father are playing out at various different levels.

In 'Circe', however, and in Ulysses as a whole, what sets things in motion, what produces the artifice, is the game of hide-and-seek with the names of the father, that is to say, alongside everything that gives the impression of being a hole there are displacements of the hole and there are displacements of the name of the father.

In passing, we have seen, rather haphazardly, Abraham, Jacob, Moses, Virag, and Dedalus too, and another who is rather funny. In one of the central episodes, where there's one eye, 'Cyclops', we meet a certain J. J. whom, you will recall, if you have some memory of it, we met in a previous episode under the name J. J. O'Molloy. The 'O' means 'descended from'. J. J., son of Molloy. His position is rather curious. He's a man of law, but a man of law – I won't say altogether diminished, but on the wane. We are told (and here the English words are interesting) that his clientele is declining, 'practice dwindling', and this is because of his 'gambling'. His gambling has in some way superseded his practice.

Clearly something would have to be developed from this. What I would simply like to indicate is the function of this perfectly false father who bears the initials of both James Joyce and John Joyce, Joyce's father. What's more, it's remarkable that the words of this

J. J. O'Molloy bear on other fathers. In a passage that links up with the riddle that Dr Lacan quoted last week (the 'Aeolus' episode, which is set in a newspaper office), it is he who turns to Stephen to give him a fine piece of rhetoric, which also holds some interest. We have learnt that O'Molloy, after having taken up gambling, started doing 'some literary work' for the press. We should note in passing that this also refers back to 'The Dead', the last of the short stories in Dubliners, where Gabriel Conroy, the main character, writes 'a literary column', but we don't know much about it (this appears in yet another manner in Exiles). What kind of literature? Is it the kind of literature that deserves to live? Gabriel asks himself the question, and we shall see that he isn't the only one.

So, we're told that J. J. O'Molloy turns to Stephen and presents him with a fine specimen of legal eloquence (pp. 134–5):

> J. J. O'Molloy turned to Stephen and said quietly and slowly:
> – One of the most polished periods I think I ever listened to in my life fell from the lips of Seymour Bushe [a surname that's one letter away from 'bush', which also refers to pubic hair]. It was in that case of fratricide, the Childs murder case. Bushe defended him.
> [Then comes a little Shakespearian aside:] And in the porches of mine ear did pour. [Hamlet.]
> By the way how did he find that out? He died in his sleep. Or the other story, beast with two backs? [This is Stephen's cogitation.]
> – What was that? the professor asked.

ITALIA, MAGISTRA, ARTIUM

[One of the titles that punctuate the episode in the newspaper office.]
– He spoke on the law of evidence, J. J. O'Molloy said, of Roman justice as contrasted with the earlier Mosaic code, the lex talionis. And he cited the Moses of Michelangelo in the vatican.
– Ha.
– A few wellchosen words, Lenehan prefaced. Silence!
[. . .]
J. J. O'Molloy resumed, moulding his words:
– He said of it: that stony effigy in frozen music, horned and terrible, of the human form divine, that eternal symbol of wisdom and of prophecy which, if aught that the imagination or the hand of sculptor has wrought in marble of soultransfigured and of soul-transfiguring deserves to live, deserves to live.

Thus, having begun to turn himself into a sounding board of legal knowledge, having specified the law of evidence in relation to other sorts of law, O'Molloy makes Bushe speak, makes the Bush speak, giving voice to a rhetorical testimony on art as founding the right to existence ('deserves to live') and the right to existence of the work of art. One can grasp the resonance that this carries in relation to newspaper literature: art founds, in law, the bearer of the Law, Moses, since he shall remain as the Vatican Moses (this is how he is designated, 'the Moses [. . .] in the vatican'): which is not uninteresting when one bears in mind what the Vatican represents in Ulysses, and furthermore, when one bears in mind that the statue in question is actually in San Pietro in Vincoli, the church of Saint Peter in Chains.

This 'deserves to live', which insists (through the rhetorical 'deserves to live, deserves to live'), bears the stamp, is countersigned, by its effects on the one for whom the 'period' was destined, namely Stephen. J. J. O'Molloy turns towards him and it transpires that, 'his blood wooed by grace of language and gesture, [he] blushed.' Curiously enough, Stephen's blushing forms a series with other texts by Joyce. I'm thinking in particular of the passage from A Portrait that you might have noticed: during a trip to Cork, Stephen goes with his father to the anatomy theatre in the medical school where his father had spent some time; very little time, it would seem. The father is in search of his carved initials. No mention is made of the fact that clearly these initials are also his (Simon Dedalus carries the initials S. D., like Stephen Dedalus). But Stephen comes across the word 'FOETUS' (also carved into the bench), which causes a great effect on him. He blushes, then pales. Thus we meet again, in relation to the initials, but in another relation, the 'deserves to live'. I'll add that this series can be extended with another passage from Dubliners, again in 'The Dead', to which I alluded earlier. The aforenamed Gabriel Conroy is about to give a speech, the customary speech for a family gathering. He's always there when you need him to write in the newspaper or make a little speech of this kind. And they've just been speaking, precisely, about artists whose names have been forgotten, those who've left nothing behind save a name that is altogether problematic.

– His name, said Aunt Kate, was Parkinson. [. . .] the purest tenor voice that was ever put into a man's throat.

This gives him pause for thought, and he takes off from there, concluding one of the first 'periods' of his speech with two things: an echo of a song called 'Love's Old Sweet Song', which evokes the lost paradise in its opening line; and a quotation from Milton (though not Paradise Lost) which says the following, 'I hope that I may leave something so written to aftertimes, that they shall not willingly let it die.'

So it is that the question of the right to existence, the question of the right to creation, the question of validity, and the question of certitude, too, find themselves knotted into Joyce's discourse.

Another thing concerning the bush: the eloquent Bushe, in speaking of Moses, is also speaking about a Holy Bush, the Holy Bush in the Bible. The Lord says to Moses that 'the place whereon thou standest is holy ground', the ground before the burning bush. The holy bush turns out to have a certain relationship with the 'fox'. For when J. J. O'Molloy reappears in Circe, he has a 'foxy moustache' and something of barrister Bushe about him. This is a fox that we have seen more than once in A Portrait, where of course it appears because Fox is one of the nicknames for Parnell, associated with his fault. But it is also very precisely a kind of signifier of dissimulation: 'He was not foxing', says the young Stephen when he is in the infirmary and afraid that he will be accused of skiving. And then, a little later, when he has just renounced joining the orders, right after picturing to himself his imaginary calling card, 'The Reverend Stephen Dedalus, S. J.', he wonders what kind of face he would have, and one of the things that comes to his mind is 'one of the Jesuits whom some [. . .] called Lantern Jaws and others Foxy Cambell'.

So, we have this bush / fox series. But there is also some wordplay, which functions for 'Molloy' / 'Molly' too, articulated on 'holy'. We had 'holly' / 'holy', 'Molly / 'Molloy', and another word that doesn't appear in Ulysses but of which Joyce says – I'm tugging this by the sleeve, or rather by the letters, but after all, he wrote those letters – he reveals to us the name of something that is supposed to enter the functioning of 'Circe', namely the plant, the golden garlic, which Hermes gave to Ulysses so that he would be able to resist Circe, and which is called 'moly'. The curious thing is that between the two, between 'moly' and 'Molly', there is a difference which belongs to the realm of phonation. What is 'phonized' in Ulysses is 'Molly', with a single vowel, and the 'moly' he speaks about is a diphthong, a ditongue as it used to be written. The ditongue (di-tongue?) transforms into a consonant at the same time as the diphthong transforms into a single vowel. There is consonantal duplication, a duplication of consonance, and this consonance is what appears in Ulysses in the shape of 'Molly'.

He says two or three curious things about 'moly'. Dr Lacan is going to analyse one of them, I believe; I'll make do with pointing out one other. It is a gift from Hermes, god of public thoroughfares, and 'the invisible influence (prayer, chance, agility, presence of mind, power of recuperation) which saves in case of accident.' Thus, this is something that confirms Bloom in his role as the prudent one. In the end, he is one who corresponds fairly well to the definition that can be found in the entry in the Lalande philosophical dictionary on this question of prudence (which is rather disappointing, probably because it is above all Saint Thomas who speaks about it). There is a short authorless note that says the following: 'Prudence. The ability, in choosing one's means, to obtain for oneself the greatest well-being.' Bloom seems to be saying that this is precisely how one gets by.

The second thing that I would like to stress is that there is an ongoing question about certainty and how to ground it.

This certainty reappears precisely with respect to the famous Virag. I didn't tell you everything. I came to a halt in the famous quotation where O'Molloy is telling the others about Virag:

> His name was Virag. The father's name that poisoned himself. He changed it by deedpoll, the father did.
>
> – That's the new Messiah for Ireland! says the citizen. Island of saints and sages!
>
> – Well, they're still waiting for their redeemer, says Martin. For that matter so are we.
>
> – Yes, says J. J., and every male that's born they think it may be their Messiah. And every jew is in a tall state of excitement, I believe, till he knows if he's a father or a mother.

I'll simply stress what is perhaps appearing over and above the humour that constitutes part of the functioning of the text of 'Cyclops'. It's barroom humour, but it's very much present. Moreover, it's a brand of humour that would have to be linked to other problems that bear on anti-Semitism, but I won't have time to tackle that now. There is an imaginary identification that situates another question: the problematic of the Messiah and, through this, the problematic of succession. The problem of the king's word that grounds legitimation, a word that enables one, even if the mother's belly has been mendacious, to land back on one's feet through legitimation. Legitimation, that is to say, the possibility of bearing the stamp of the king, the crown, στέφανος, or else to bear this other stamp that appears in 'Circe' with Virag, the grandfather, who 'chutes rapidly down through the chimneyflue', bearing the label basilicogrammate, 'the king's grammate'. This problematic of legitimacy that turns out to be problematic legitimation is perhaps assuming here the figure of the imaginary dimension and its recuperation.

It seems to me that Joyce uses certainty and brings it onto the stage in its relationships with the effects of the voice. Even if a word, a paternal word, is challenged at the level of what it says, it seems to suggest that something of it passes into the personation, into what lies behind the personation, into what lies on the side of phonation, perhaps, on the side of something that is also something that 'deserves to live' in melody; perhaps precisely because of this something that in spite of everything has effects on the mother through melody. The mother's 'phantasmal mirth', which is mentioned at the beginning of Ulysses bears very precisely on pantomime and old Royce (Roi-Joyce), who used to sing. Something passes through the melody, and perhaps not merely sentimentality. Of course, Irish culture at the turn of the century was altogether pervaded by melody, especially the melodies of Thomas Moore, which in Finnegans Wake Joyce calls 'Moore's maladies'. Moreover, it was in this that Joyce's father, John Joyce, exulted. But in this art of the voice, of phonation, perhaps just enough of it was passed on to the son.

In short, while this certainty with respect to what he makes always has something to do with the mirror, with these mirror effects that would have to be enumerated, this also has to do with the voice-effects of the signifier. I would like to remind you that 'The Dead', with which Joyce concluded Dubliners, at a crucial moment in his poetic production, at a time when things became unblocked in some respect, the guiding idea of 'The Dead' occurred to him when his brother told him about a particular interpretation of one of Moore's melodies that staged a dialogue between revenants and the living. Stanislaus said to him that the fellow who sang it did so in an interesting way, in a way that said something. Then, as if by chance, Joyce set to writing 'The Dead'. And one of the centrepieces of this short story is the moment when the protagonist's wife is mesmerized, frozen into stone like the Moses statue, listening to a hoarse-voiced singer singing this famous melody. What effect does this have on the protagonist? It turns his wife into a symbol.

> A woman was standing near the top of the first flight, in the shadow [. . .]. He asked himself what a woman standing on the stairs in the shadow [. . .] is a symbol of.

He describes her in vaguely realist terms, but at the same time he asks what she symbolizes. This symbolizes a certain way of listening, among other things.

Joyce wanted to set out the rules for this certainty, for the problems of certainty and its grounding in relation to the voice's effects on the signifier, in an aesthetic science, but fairly quickly he saw that this was not so firmly linked to science, and that it was precisely a savoir-faire tethered by a practice of the signifier. What is foremost in my mind, which imposes itself upon me through and beyond what Aristotle said about praxis in his Poetics (which gave Joyce pause for thought), is Lacan's definition: 'a concerted action on the part of man [. . .] that puts him en mésure, in a position, to deal with the real through the symbolic.' It is precisely in 'Circe' that we perceive this question of mésure, when Bloom, entering the brothel, is seen by Stephen as he turns. And this evocation of mésure is, as if by chance, also a quotation from Revelation. I should doubtless stop here before my talk becomes overly apocalyptic.

READING NOTES

Jacques Aubert

References to Stephen Hero are from the 1963 New Directions edition, edited by J. J. Slocum and H. Cahoon, which includes five additional manuscript pages that were missing from earlier editions; references to A Portrait of the Artist as a Young Man are from the 1977 Viking Press edition, which follows the same pagination as the 1964 Critical Library corrected text, edited (with criticism and notes) by Chester G. Anderson; the edition of Ulysses referenced below is the Oxford World's Classics edition (which reproduces the original 1922 Shakespeare & Co. text).

I

Joyce, in the first chapter of Ulysses, expressed his wish to Hellenize: see Ulysses, p. 7: 'God, Kinch [nickname given to Stephen Dedalus by Buck Mulligan], if you and I could only work together we might do something for the island. Hellenise it.' Mulligan has been elaborating on this same theme from the very start. It was only in Trieste, from 1905 on, that Joyce started studying Greek and mixing with some delight with the Greek rabble, in whom he must have found something of the Dublin rabble (see Mando Aravantinou, 'Joyce et ses amis grecs', in James Joyce, L'Herne, 1985, pp. 58–64).

. . .as someone [. . .], Philippe Sollers, has remarked in Tel Quel . . .: Philippe Sollers, 'Joyce et C^ie', in Tel Quel, Issue 64, Winter 1975, pp. 15–24.

. . . opening a Joyce symposium . . .: this was the fifth International Joyce Symposium, held in Paris over 16–20 June, 1975. The proceedings were collected and presented by Jacques Aubert and Maria Jolas in collaboration with the CNRS Press and the University of Lille-III, in a two-volume set, under the title Joyce & Paris (1902 . . . 1920–1940 . . . 1975), 1979. Volume I included the first ever publication of the Lacan lecture that features in the appendix to the present book.[1]

. . . Adam [. . .] was a Madam . . .: see Ulysses, p. 132: 'Madam, I'm Adam. And Able was I ere I saw Elba.' The palindrome is uttered by Lenehan, the group joker, whom we met back in Dubliners. The 'Abel'/'able' pun will be taken up again in Finnegans Wake (287.11): 'I cain but are you able?', where signifier and voice are interwoven in a yet more subtle manner.

. . . Joyce had slaved quite enough over this saint homme: the young Joyce claimed to have composed a treatise of aesthetic theory based on texts by Saint Thomas Aquinas. See A Portrait of the Artist, p. 209.

. . . Jacques Aubert's book . . .: the book in question is Introduction à l'esthétique de James Joyce, Paris: Didier, 1973. It was substantially revised and expanded for the English-language edition: The Aesthetics of James Joyce, John Hopkins University Press, 1992.

The Freeman's Journal represented this Home Rule . . .: see Ulysses, p. 55: 'What Arthur Griffith said about the headpiece over the Freeman leader: a homerule sun rising up in the northwest from the laneway behind the bank of Ireland.' The 'Home Rule' slogan of the Irish autonomists of the 1880s and '90s is also evocative of the Bloom couple.

. . . the heretic: from the time of his earliest writings Joyce showed a certain fascination for the position of the heretic, embodied in his eyes by Giordano Bruno. See for example 'The Bruno Philosophy' (in Critical Writings of James Joyce, ed. E. Mason and R. Ellmann, New York: Viking Press, 1966, pp. 132–34); the penultimate chapter of A Portrait of the Artist; and also Ulysses, pp. 20–21, p. 199. In each case, alongside the question of the Church, the question of the position of the Father in the Trinity is posed.

. . . a boozing father who was more or less a Fenian . . .: Joyce's father was less Fenian (as in the mid-nineteenth-century violent nationalist movement) than feignant, lazy.

. . . the critics . . .: Richard Ellman (James Joyce, Oxford University Press, revised edition, 1982, p. 703) reports the following reply from Joyce to Jacob Schwartz, who asked him, 'Why have you written the book this way?' – 'To keep the critics busy for three hundred years.' He also reproduces the reply Joyce gave to Max Eastman: 'The demand that I make of my reader is that he should devote his whole life to reading my works.'

. . . the edition to get . . .: Jacques Lacan is alluding to the edition that he recommended in the flyer announcing the Seminar: A Portrait of the Artist as a Young Man. Text, Criticism and Notes, ed. C. G. Anderson, New York: Viking Critical Library, 1968. The text has the same pagination as the later edition from the same publisher, which we are referencing here.

. . . Beeb or Beeb-ie?: Jacques Lacan is enquiring as to the pronunciation of the name of the author Maurice Beebe, whose article features in the edition in question under the title 'The Artist as Hero' (pp. 340–57).

. . . Hugh Kenner . . .: his article bears the title, 'The Portrait in perspective' (pp. 416–39), taken from his book, Dublin's Joyce, London: Chatto & Windus, 1955.

. . . umpire: an allusion to the debate in the second episode of Ulysses (pp. 29–30) between Stephen Dedalus and Mr Deasy, the director of the school where Stephen teaches, an Anglo-Irishman loyal to the British empire and a willing umpire between his pupils. Lacan's remark draws its significance from the previous page where we hear Stephen pondering over the body of one of his pupils and the body of the child he once was. Joyce's stance in relation to his country is clearly linked to the regulation of Irish bodies by the joint forces of the Catholic church and Anglo-Saxon Puritanism, which united in spectacular fashion against the hero of his youth, Parnell, an advocate of Irish independence; hence the importance of his departure in October 1904, with a woman, Nora Barnacle, and his later refusal to return. This return was dramatized in Exiles, where there is an insistent questioning of woman's desire, sexual relationship, and jealousy. See too the story told by Davin in A Portrait of the Artist, pp. 182–3.

. . . the uncreated conscience of my race.: A Portrait of the Artist, pp. 252–3: 'I go to encounter for the millionth time the reality of experience and to forge in the smithy of my soul the uncreated conscience of my race.'

II

. . . sentimental . . .: Cf. Ulysses, p. 191, Stephen's telegram announcing the end of his friendship with Buck Mulligan: 'The sentimentalist is he who would enjoy without incurring the immense debtorship for a thing done.'[2]

How can an art target in an expressly divinatory way . . .: this is undoubtedly an allusion to the passages in A Portrait of the Artist (pp. 224–6) where Stephen Dedalus presents himself, not without a certain distance, as an augur; he will remember this in Ulysses, p. 209; see also p. 534. In Ulysses the matter is clearly linked to a subject's peculiarly poetic questioning of his shadow (p. 48):

> Why not endless till the farthest star? Darkly they are there behind this light, darkness shining in the brightness, delta of Cassiopeia, worlds. Me sits there with his augur's rod of ash, in borrowed sandals, by day beside a livid sea, unbeheld, in violet night walking beneath a reign of uncouth stars. I throw this ended shadow from me, manshape ineluctable, call it back. Endless, would it be mine, form of my form?

IV

. . . a book here, by a certain Robert Martin Adams . . .: Surface and Symbol: The Consistency of James Joyce's Ulysses, London/New York: Oxford University Press, 1962. On several occasions Adams insists (for example p. 33) on the importance of enigma in Ulysses. He also readily uses the term 'symptomatic', in a way that is rather vague (p. 25, p. 59n).

. . . Trinity College, if I remember rightly.: Stephen actually teaches in a public school in Dalkey, a Dublin suburb. He has taught neither at Trinity College, nor at University College where, like Joyce, he is supposed to have done his higher education, nor even at Belvedere College, the Jesuit secondary school he attended as an adolescent. Lacan's slip can of course be read in light of his interest in the Trinitarian, notably in relation to the psychosis of Newton, who was a professor at Trinity[3] ('Television', in Television/A Challenge to the Psychoanalytic Establishment, New York: Norton, 1990, p. 36). Thus, the two cases are brought together, the question of the Trinity appearing at the right place in Ulysses in its close relationship with heresy. On this subject, see Jean-Louis Houdebine and Philippe Sollers, 'La Trinité de Joyce, I et II', Tel Quel, 83, Spring 1980, pp. 36–88.

. . . a certain Février . . .: James G. Février, Histoire de l'écriture, revised edition, Paris: Payot, 1959.[4]

. . . Stephen, whose name also begins with an S.: it has also been observed that Ulysses begins and ends with an 'S': 'Stately [. . .] Yes.'

Beauty according to Hogarth: an allusion to Hogarth's line of beauty, to which Joyce returns on many occasions in his early texts, in particular in A Portrait of the Artist (p. 181) when he mentions his schoolfellow Davin, the typical young nationalist peasant:

> His nurse had taught him Irish and shaped his rude imagination by the broken lights of Irish myth. He stood towards the myth upon which no individual mind had ever drawn out a line of beauty and to its unwieldy tales that divided against themselves as they moved down the cycles in the same attitude as towards the Roman catholic religion.

Joyce is pointing out the distance that lies between the artist and productions of the unconscious that have colonizing effects.

. . . really not for him . . .: see Ulysses, pp. 648–9.

. . . far too implausible to attribute to Bloom a knowledge of Shakespeare . . .: this has to do with an enigma in Ulysses pointed out by Adams, op. cit., pp. 95–9, that carries remarkable significance in the ordering of the structure. In Bloom's 'interior monologue' on p. 269, two lines reappear that had first emerged in Stephen's discourse on p. 193 (and to which he returns on p. 615):

> Do and do. Thing done. In a rosery of Fetter Lane of Gerard, herbalist, he walks, greyedauburn. An azured harebell like her veins. Lids of Juno's eyes, violets. He walks. One life is all. One body. Do. But do. Afar, in a reek of lust and squalor, hands are laid on whiteness.

These fragments and their apparent discordance, which raises the question of the relationship of identification between Bloom and Stephen, are all the more remarkable in that they knot the signifiers of identity to the body, and above all to the act. Furthermore, the intertextuality points up the question of debt: 'Thing done' is an echo of the telegram Stephen sent to Buck Mulligan: 'The sentimentalist is he who would enjoy without incurring the immense debtorship for a thing done.' (p. 191).

. . . Blephen and Stoom . . .: see Ulysses, p. 635, and Adams, p. 95.

. . . a book of himself.: does the knot lie exactly where Lacan suggests it does? See Ulysses, p. 179, where the librarian at the National Library quotes Mallarmé commenting on Hamlet: 'He says: il se promene, lisant au livre de lui-même, don't you know, reading the book of himself.'

. . . a certain Shechner . . .: Mark Shechner, Joyce in Nighttown, A Psychoanalytic Inquiry into Ulysses, Berkeley: University of California Press, 1974.

The cock crew . . .: This riddle is in the second episode of Ulysses, 'Nestor', p. 27. A few lines above (p. 26), Stephen gives the start of another conundrum, which follows the evocation of the shadow of Jesus and his riddles 'woven and woven on the church's looms':

Riddle me, riddle me, randy ro.
My father gave me seeds to sow.

The solution, which Joyce omits, is noteworthy:

The seed was black and the ground was white.
Riddle me that and I'll give you a pipe.

Answer: writing a letter.[5]

The fox burying . . .: Ulysses, p. 27.

. . . whether he's a father or a mother.: see Ulysses, p. 323: '. . . every male that's born they think it may be their Messiah. And every jew is in a tall state of excitement, I believe, till he knows if he's a father or a mother.'

He believes that he carries her in his belly.: I have not been able to locate any part of the text that goes in this direction. Joyce uses this idea instead in relation to his work. On the other hand, he does see Nora pregnant with him: cf., for example, his letters to Nora on 5 September 1909 ('O that I could nestle in your womb like a child') and on 24 September ('take me into the dark sanctuary of your womb'), in Letters of James Joyce, Vol. II, ed. R. Ellmann, New York: Viking, p. 248, p. 281.

. . . inconceivably private jokes.: from Adams, op. cit., p. 200.

. . . eftsoon: 'eftsoon' can be found in Finnegans Wake at 473.18. Here Lacan is pointing out the style of reading to which Joyce pushes us, rather than his writing style: a style of reading that follows a metonymic line, even though his writing cannot be defined in this way (unlike that of Wolfson, for example).

V

Scribbledehobble: the full title is Scribbledehobble: The Ur-Workbook for Finnegans Wake, ed. Thomas E. Connolly, Evanston: Northwestern University Press, 1961. Dr Lacan is clearly confusing this academic with Cyril Connolly (1903–1974), editor-in-chief of the literary magazine Horizon (1940–1949) which published British authors from the 1930s and '40s, alongside some French and American writers. Cyril Connolly is surely better known as the author of The Unquiet Grave; A Word Cycle by Palinurus (1944, reprinted in 1961), a voyage into the mind of a writer haunted by the wandering ghost of Palinurus, the helmsman of Aeneas' ship. One may wonder whether it is not in relation to this background figure of 'A-Father', who also comes from Troy, albeit in a different way, that Lacan, turning his interest to the story of Ulysses, finds this Connolly again. See also footnote 3 on p. 7 of the second volume of Joyce's complete works in French, Œuvres (Bibliothèque de la Pléiade), about Conolly Norman, who seems to have been the first Irish psychiatrist to come across Freud's work.[6]

. . . letters . . . unpublishable.: in fact, most of these letters (with the exception of those of 8 and 9 December 1909, to which Jacques Lacan nevertheless had access even prior to the 1975 publication of Selected Letters), which were absent from Volume I, had been published in Volumes II and III (1966).

. . . Tweedledum and Tweedledee.: Joyce uses these two names in his 24 June 1921 letter to Harriet S. Weaver, in Letters, Vol. I, ed. S. Gilbert, New York: Viking, 1966, p. 167:

> A batch of people in Zurich persuaded themselves that I was gradually going mad and actually endeavoured to induce me to enter a sanatorium where a certain Doctor Jung (the Swiss Tweedledum who is not to be confused with the Viennese Tweedledee, Dr. Freud) amuses himself at the expense (in every sense of the word) of ladies and gentlemen who are troubled by bees in their bonnets.

Cranly questions him . . .: A Portrait of the Artist, p. 243.

In Stephen Hero, there are traces.: notably where Joyce plays with the 'enigma of a manner' (p. 27), the fantasies of heroism, of 'egoism', of redemption,[7] and then the slide towards the poetic route offered by Franciscan literature. See, too, the note on 'a book of himself', above.

. . . the Church diplomatic.: see Stephen Hero, p. 172. See also the passages mentioning the Jesuits and their duplicity in A Portrait of the Artist, such as p. 184 and p.189.

. . . his calling.: see A Portrait of the Artist, pp. 172–3 and p. 252, entry of 16 April.

VI

. . . Lucia . . . sending telepath.: see Richard Ellmann, James Joyce, op. cit., p. 677 (letter to Harriet S. Weaver of 21 October 1934), p. 682, and p. 684.

. . . the initial fault . . .: fault, and its return in the theme of the Fall/ falling, is staged throughout Finnegans Wake.

VIII

. . . Madame Blavatsky . . .: Clive Hart (in Structure and Motif in Finnegans Wake, Evanston: Northwestern University Press, 1962, p. 49, pp. 56–7 and passim) makes a great deal of Madame Blavatsky's theses, as well as those of Jung.

. . . Finnegans Wake,. . . a nightmare . . .: see Ulysses, p. 34: 'History, Stephen said, is a nightmare from which I am trying to awake.' One will recall that La femme in the plural in Finnegans Wake, Anna

Livia Plurabelle, is generally designated by her acronym, ALP, which in German means 'nightmare', when she does not expressly turn into the 'cunnyngnest couchmare' (576.28).[8]

X

. . . atop Mount Nebo the Law was given to us.: I am unable to find where Joyce ever could have written this sentence, even to attribute a blunder to someone or other (in Deuteronomy 32:49, it is actually the site of the death of Moses, overlooking Canaan).[9] The rhythm is vaguely reminiscent of a (parodic?) student song.

Cork: this anecdote is reported by Richard Ellmann in his biography, James Joyce, op. cit., p. 551.

. . . the little table of points of correspondence . . .: the two most commonly accessible tables, one of which Joyce entrusted to his friend Carlo Linati, and the other, later, to Herbert Gorman, his first biographer, are detailed episode by episode at the end of each notice in the French edition of Œuvres, op. cit., tome II.[10]

. . . a hiding.: this incident features in the second chapter of A Portrait of the Artist, pp. 80–82.

. . . masochism . . . He insisted enough on this point with Bloom.: see, for example, some of the passages from the 'Circe' episode in Ulysses and, of course, Joyce's letters to Nora, like the letter of 13 December 1909 (Letters of James Joyce, Vol. II).

. . . epiphanies. Joyce's epiphanies were first published as Epiphanies, ed. O. Silverman, Buffalo: University of Buffalo/Easy Hill Press, 1956; then in Robert Scholes and Richard M. Kain, The Workshop of Daedalus: James Joyce and the raw materials for A Portrait of the Artist as a Young Man, Evanston: Northwestern Press, 1965; and finally in Poems and Shorter Writings, ed. R. Ellmann and A. W. Litz, London: Faber & Faber, 1991.

Joyce the Symptom

. . . at seventeen . . .: there is a mistake here regarding Lacan's age, since Joyce only arrived in Paris in 1920 when Lacan was nineteen. The following sentence suggests that Lacan was present on 7 December 1921 ('when [he] was twenty') in Adrienne Monnier's bookshop, for the first public reading of fragments from Ulysses in English and French. [Indeed, Lacan told me that he had been present at this reading – J.-A. M.]

. . . freudened . . .: Finnegans Wake, 115.22-23: 'when they were young and easily freudened.'

This reference to the importance of being called Ernest arises more than once in Finnegans Wake.: a surprising remark given that The Importance of Being Earnest only appears in Finnegans Wake at 233.20. De Profundis is the most-cited work of Wilde's. It is possible that Lacan was familiar with Hester Travers-Smith's book Psychic Messages from Oscar Wilde, published in 1924, which launches a ferocious attack on Ulysses and is considered to be the source of pp. 534 to 538 of Finnegans Wake.

Mr Atherton . . .: James S. Atherton, The Books at the Wake: A Study of Literary Allusions in James Joyce's Finnegans Wake, New York: Viking Press, 1960, revised and expanded edition, 1974.

Work that was in Progress for seventeen years: Joyce began his book in the spring of 1923; the first copy was given to him on 30 January 1939, ahead of his birthday on 2 February, but the book was not actually released until 4 May, in London and New York.

. . . letter, litter: see Jacques Lacan, 'Lituraterre', translated by B. Khiara-Foxton and A. R. Price, in Hurly-Burly, 9, May 2013, p. 29. And, of course, Finnegans Wake.[11]

Who ails tongue coddeau . . .: Finnegans Wake (15.18).[12]

. . . each as baneful as the other.: see Ulysses, p. 20.

Chamber Music: see the first poem in the collection.

A NOTE THREADED STITCH BY STITCH

Jacques-Alain Miller

§ 1. An apologue

Philippe Sollers! Lacan enquires about him at the start of The Sinthome, p. 3: is he in the audience? Why yes, he is, and so he shall be, a regular attender the whole year through.

He will be there too at the 'evening event with Jacques Aubert' mentioned on pp. 106–7 (which was held at the Hôtel-Dieu, organized by the Department of Psychoanalysis at the University of Paris-VIII; after being published by Navarin in the fourth issue of the bulletin Analytica, Aubert's lecture was reprinted in Joyce avec Lacan, again by Navarin, pp. 69–84, under the title, 'Galeries pour un portrait'). He will also see the film cited on the same page, In the Realm of the Senses (Ai no corrida, by Nagisa Oshima, 1976), though at a different screening from the one Lacan attended.

In an interview that is about to appear to accompany the release of The Sinthome (agreement struck with Sollers by telephone on 17 January 2005) the writer mentions an evening gathering in the 1970s. The story runs as follows:

Lacan, seated on the floor, making an effort to get up on his feet, and stumbling, is joined by Sollers who 'moves into place to help him stand upright.' 'Leave him will you,' appealed Sylvia, Lacan's wife, 'he's grown up now!'

'Need I comment on this?', asks Sollers in his interview. 'No . . . "He's grown up now": it's not worth helping him to walk . . . One oughtn't to say such things! One oughtn't to say such things, seeking some rapport . . . well, seeking some erotic innuendo with a younger man. It's shocking. For me, [. . .] Lacan isn't a child.'

It's a sensational scene. However, dear Philippe, please excuse me, but it can be understood rather differently.

What does Sylvia say? She's says that you are the one, Philippe, who is taking Lacan for a child. Yes, you, by rushing to his aid. Is she really mocking him? Isn't she rebuffing you instead, the over-attentive one?

She is the one who is pointing out to you that Lacan is not a child anymore, or that he is no more of one than touthomme, 'everyman', in one word, as Lacan wrote it.

Who is speaking? Why, let's take a look. She is a 'true woman', one who is defined by not being a mother, who would sooner trip a man up than 'stand him up straight'. In short, Philippe, you are playing the role of a mother to Lacan. As for her, she is a Medea (see below, § 15).

Certainly Eros is in on it, but which Eros? His wife has her idea about it. Under her nose an officious young man is forcing his attentions upon her husband. 'Noli tangere', says she.

I'm not saying that you are wrong to detect in Sylvia's remark an invitation to you, but how can one fail to see that this sentence only takes on its erotic meaning from the gesture of solicitude that precedes it, when you make to steady the doddering old man? All in all, Sylvia is telling you: 'Leave be, young fellow, turn your interest to a woman, rather than him.'

Doubtless her injunction is addressed to Lacan as much as to you.

Ah! You weren't the only one, Philippe, hovering around Lacan, wanting to lend him a hand in his old age, 'moving into place to help him stand upright'. There was Jacques Aubert, there was I, Jacques-Alain, there was the whole clique caught in the 'transference'. Do you think that we who, like you, had a weakness for great men, were looked upon with favourable eye by the woman who accompanied him through life?

You who have made a vocation out of your admiration for Bataille, you take exception to Sylvia saying to you disappointedly: 'Ah, you're getting interested in Georges?', and you virtuously demur: 'For me, Bataille was not "Georges".' Indeed not, but don't you see, for her he was? The whole problem lies there.

Sylvia was a heretic, in her way. In her eyes you were nothing but an idolatrous youth, as was I. She would chip away at our idols with feet of clay, or smash them. She would never get up on her escabeau (see below, § 5).

Do you know that one morning she told me: 'Ah, Jacques-Alain, I'm very tired. I spent the night burning all Georges's letters'?

We wouldn't have done that, would we now, Philippe? (Again, see below, § 15). But then, Bataille had never been our 'ravaging man' (see above, p. 84).

Sollers helps Lacan. Sylvia rebuffs Sollers. She is entirely the 'helpmeet against' that God created for Adam in the person of woman (Genesis 2:18), the same that is twice mentioned in The Sinthome (the more optimistic King James Version translates, on the contrary: 'an help meet for him'). With the 'extreme sense of uniqueness' that Lacan saw in her (see The Seminar Book VII, The Ethics of Psychoanalysis, p. 296), she perceived the romantic dream of the capable man who, thirty years later, would say laughingly of Lacan: 'I think that the transference was reciprocal, and to my advantage.'

This transference is there, Philippe, in the supporting gesture that makes a couple of Sollers and Lacan. And that is when Sylvia interposes from a third position. There is now a trio and, deciphering it through The Sinthome, it is Borromean.

Sollers, wholly unto his reciprocal transference, is the imaginary. His touthommie, his 'everymanliness' makes him believe that Lacan, righting himself under his helping hand, is imaginary like him. 'No, he doesn't need you for that, he can stand upright by himself', says Sylvia, 'and, he is symbolic' (see § 13, in fine). As for her, she is the real (see Anxiety, chapter XIV, pp. 182–96), unless she is the sinthome (above, p. 84) that prevents the real from stealing away.

To end, I will gladly surrender my arms to you, Philippe. I'm not out to get the better of you.

Without you, we wouldn't have this sublime vaudeville. To disclose this scene you had to pass through gates that are guarded by the Demon of Shame. Perhaps that cost you less than it cost me – for I too had to do so, to follow you into the incandescent zone where Bataille's letters smoulder beside those of Gide, and where you advance, intrepid, braving the mille e tre plus one, to take the hand of Il Commendatore so that fall, he shall not.

There is no better apologue for The Sinthome. Lacan called upon Joyce in order to take a step beyond the point at which Freud had come to a standstill. Isn't this what you were miming that evening? Literature flying to the aid of psychoanalysis just as it is about to fall flat on its face.

Sylvia couldn't help but intervene, due to an effect of constraint.

§ 2. Effects of constraint

Lacan announced that his initial intention was to call his Seminar 4, 5, 6 (p. 4).

Indeed, in the last session of his Seminar RSI, on 13 May, he had taken up once more the Borromean knot with four rings (the real, the symbolic, the imaginary, plus the symptom) that had been introduced on 14 January of the same year, and had asserted that, 'in committing oneself to this four, one comes across a particular path that only goes up to six.' The lecture that he would later give as the opening to the Joyce Symposium in June 1975 turned him away from this project.

What could this 'particular path' be? My hypothesis is that it had to do with exploiting the combinatorial possibilities that are in evidence in the tables to be found on p. 12 and p. 40 of The Sinthome.

The first table, which had already been mentioned on 13 May, establishes a double correlation, 1–2/3–4, evidenced by the knot on the same page; a correlation such that, using the four named rings, it would enable one to obtain effects of constraint that we may observe to be the same as those of the alpha, beta, gamma, delta syntax from the 'Seminar on "The Purloined Letter"', (cf. Écrits, pp. 49–50 of the 1966 Seuil edition): by ascribing a term from one of the pairs to one of the four possible places, constraints appear when it comes to setting down the terms of the second pair in the remaining places.

The second table lists the three configurations obtained from the three terms R, S, I, when subjected to 'a non-permutative revolution in their position', as is the case for the four terms $\mathcal{S}$, S_1, S_2, and a in 'Radiophonie' (Autres écrits, p. 444 of the 2001 Seuil edition), while the 'sinthome' term remains fixed in one place.

It is not hard to come up with a third table on which the permutation of the terms R, S, I is this time permitted, with Σ remaining fixed. In this case, six configurations are obtained:

R	S	I
S	I	R
I	R	S
R	I	S
S	R	I
I	S	R

Σ

My hypothesis, therefore, is that Lacan had been planning to privilege the study of the three further knots that can be added to the first three that already featured in the second table, and which had been isolated in the Seminar RSI. Knots 4, 5, and 6 would thus be RIS, SRI, and ISR, with, in each case, the fourth ring Σ. I imagine that in a second phase the exploration of this path alone would not have yielded the results that Lacan might have been anticipating from it. Following the Joyce trail struck him as a more fruitful enterprise.

§ 3. Some diffuse bleed on the knot

Before Lacan could turn his interest to the Borromean knot it first had to come to him by way of his friend the mathematician G. T. Guilbaud.

On 8 February 1972, Lacan was preparing his Seminar of the following day around a sentence he had come up with, I ask you to refuse what I am offering you because this is not it, when good fortune delivered into his hands, in the person of a woman by the name of V* P*, the Borromean knot. On 9 February, Lacan said the following:

> Now here's a strange thing. While I was wondering yesterday evening how I might present this to you today with my geometry of the tetrad, it so happened that, dining with a charming person who attends the courses of Monsieur Guilbaud, I was given, like a ring slid on my finger, something that I should like to show you now. It would seem to be nothing less – this I learnt yesterday evening – than the family crest of the House of Borromeo (The Seminar Book XIX, . . . or Worse, chapter VI).

Georges Théodule Guilbaud introduced von Neumann and Morgenstern's game theory into post-war France (see his still renowned article from the journal Économie appliquée, Vol. 2, Issue 2, April-June 1949, pp. 275–319[1]), which also caught Lacan's interest. His article 'Les problèmes de partage' (Économie appliquée, Vol. 5, Issue 1, April–June 1951, pp. 93–137) was used by Lacan in Seminar XVI with regard to Pascal's wager (chapter VII). Guilbaud later found himself 'at the centre of the development of operational research in France' (see his interview in Les Annales des Mines, Issue 67, March 2002).

The knot had long featured in popular books of mathematical curiosities, for instance Mathematics and the Imagination by Edward Kasner and James Newman (first published by Simon & Schuster in 1940, with several subsequent reprints). Lacan owned a copy of this book. On p. 287, the knot is presented as 'the trademark used by a well-known brewer', and the commentary makes do with pointing out the 'strange relation' between the three rings. When Lacan showed Quine the resources of the knot, the eminent philosopher saw nothing more in it than 'a little topological curiosity that was engaging in its way' (see below, § 9).

This is the occasion to remind the reader that, as indicated by Alexei Sossinsky in the preface to his semi-popular presentation (Knots: Mathematics with a Twist, Cambridge MA: Harvard University Press, 2002, p. vii), 'for reasons I do not entirely understand', knots were long ignored by mathematicians, who only got to grips with them once and for all in the twentieth century. Up until the mid-1980s, this theory did not engage many beyond a small circle of specialists.

It should be added that the physicists preceded the mathematicians here. William Thomson, Lord Kelvin, inventor of absolute zero (– 273.15° C) and the temperature scale that bears his name, came up with nodal models of molecular structure and was particularly attentive to the trefoil knot. A prankish theosophy has sprung up around this, and I wouldn't be able to forgive myself for neglecting to share with the reader of The Sinthome the laughter to be had at the website Kelvin is Lord (zapatopi.net/kelvin/).

Once my own interest had been kindled by Lacan, in 1973 or thereabouts I got hold of Introduction to Knot Theory (R. H. Crowell and R. H. Fox, Boston: Ginn-Blaisdell, 1963), which I passed on to him. It is quite possible that Pierre Soury transmitted to him the articles, or at least the knots, by Listing and Milnor which are reproduced in the Seminar. Soury was a young mathematician, who died all too young; an endearing character who, along with his friend Michel Thomé (see, notably, p. 34, passim), developed a passion for Lacan's knots. Lacan found in Soury and Thomé a competence and an availability that he had been seeking in vain among most of his listeners and the psychoanalysts of his School.

During his stay in New York, on the transatlantic trip that he undertook between the first and second sessions of the present Seminar, Lacan had a conversation with Dalí and tried to spark some interest in the Borromean knot, but to no avail. Such had already been the case with Heidegger, to whom he had paid a visit in Freiburg im Breisgau with this in mind during the year of RSI. Lacan confides that the German didn't say a word, and showed him instead a heap of his course manuscripts still waiting to be published.

Having appeared in Seminar XIX, the knot surfaces again in Encore, in chapter X. It is the centrepiece of the lecture Lacan gave in Rome in 1974 (due to appear in the 'Paradoxes de Lacan' series); with its title, 'La troisième', it fits into the series of Lacan's talks in Rome, after the 1953 'Function and field of speech and language' (Écrits, op. cit., pp. 237–322) and the 1968 'La psychanalyse. Raison d'un échec' (Autres écrits, op. cit., pp. 341–9). Lastly, the 1974–1975 Seminar RSI, just prior to The Sinthome, deals with the knot itself and with the triad of the real, the symbolic, and the imaginary that was inspired by Lévi-Strauss and which marked the beginning of Lacan's teaching sensu stricto (see the 1953 lecture on the symbolic, the imaginary, and the real).

The series begun by RSI, which reaches its heights with The Sinthome, constitutes Lacan's return to the fundaments of his project and his calling into question of psychoanalysis. The depth of this questioning has seen no equal, but this has remained largely unperceived given the care Lacan took in shielding his listeners from the full impact of his discourse and its highly charged potentialities, hence his desire, which never came to be, to limit his disquisition to a much smaller circle. One can't help thinking that Lacan's late teaching belonged to the same register as the esoteric teaching that found a place in the Schools of antiquity.

An aristocratic notion of 'creative subjectivity' has a long history in Lacan, but never, and especially in The Sinthome, would he yield to the temptation to wager exclusively on an elite. See the following passage from the 1953 'Function and field of speech and language': 'To emphasize how few subjects there are who support this [symbolic] creation would be to give in to a Romantic viewpoint' (Écrits, op. cit., p. 283); or this passage from 1973:

> The more saints there are among us, the more laughter there is. That's my principle. Indeed, that's the way out of the capitalist discourse – which will not constitute any progress, if only for some. (Autres écrits, op. cit., p. 520)

Lacan's repeated lamenting in The Sinthome as to the inordinate number of people in his audience clearly hints that the doctrine he was exposing to the four winds was meant to be kept secret. Giving a public form to an esoteric teaching forces one to conceal at the same time as disclosing. One has in some sense to button up while still speaking, as Baltasar Gracián advocated, and to make use of all the procedures outlined by Leo Strauss in Persecution and the Art of Writing, hence Lacan's cryptic mi-dire, the 'half saying' that is particularly in evidence in The Sinthome (see below § 15).

So it was that, unlike Freud, though instructed by the misadventures of his apostolic succession, Lacan refrained from selecting a circle of supposedly loyal followers and from binding himself to this chosen people – like Venice wedding the sea in her Sposalizio del Mare – by handing out rings. (Concerning the Secret Committee, the inner circle of the Seven Rings, see 'The situation of psychoanalysis and the training of psychoanalysts in 1956', in Écrits, op. cit., pp. 473–4.) The only ring on Lacan's finger is the knot (see above). The annoyance felt by his pretenders is evinced well enough by the faithful animosity they have vowed to his son-in-law.

It is beyond doubt that Lacan harboured the same sentiments for psychoanalysts that he attributed to Freud:

> It is not hard to identify the contempt for men that Freud felt each time he set his mind to bringing them face to face with the task [of psychoanalytic technique] he deemed to be beyond their means. By that time, however, this contempt had been consolidated by recurrent acts of abandonment in which he had taken measure of how mentally and morally unfit his first followers had been; minds and characters who only too clearly surpassed the best of men by far, as they did the host of those who since then have spread the world over with his doctrine ('Psychoanalysis and its teaching', Écrits, op. cit., pp. 458–9).

On the theme of contempt, which Lacan attributes to Marx and Lenin, as well as to Freud himself, see Encore, chapter VIII.

One can hardly deny that this severe appraisal finds nothing but confirmation in the way that a not insignificant portion of the French psychoanalytic community greeted, late in 2003, an enterprise that sought quite openly to do away with psychoanalysis. At the same time the swashbuckling intelligentsia were to be seen stepping into the breach, as though Sollers's generous, mild, and intimate gesture with regard to Lacan that evening in the 1970s were fated to repeat throughout history (see P. Sollers, 'L'avenir de la psychanalyse', in L'infini, Issue 67, summer 2004, pp. 55–9; Bernard-Henri Lévy, 'Pour une charte de la psychanalyse' and 'La cause de Freud', in Récidives, Paris: Grasset, 2004, pp. 114–131; along with the numerous contributions in Le Nouvel Âne, issues 1 to 4, 2003–2004). 'What am I getting mixed-up in?', we could hear from the side of the mob that went to ground, 'those guys aren't analysts'.

The knot opens out onto an infinite series, which can be qualified as ascendant since one may always add further 'rings of string' in the Borromean relation. This relation only begins, however, with the third ring.

We may point out that the Borromean series is in this respect analogous to what is known as the Fibonacci sequence, on which Lacan spent a great deal of time in his sixteenth Seminar: it is evident that the general law that dictates the series (each new number is composed by adding together the two previous numbers) can only start to be applied with its third term:

1 1 2 3 5 8 13 21 34 . . .

§ 4. Aristotle and the not-all

Lacan's attention had been drawn to Aristotelian quantification (p. 6) by the article that the Cahiers pour l'analyse (the journal of the Epistemology Circle of the École normale supérieure) had requested from the philosopher Jacques Brunschwig, and which was published as the leader article of issue 10 (1969). The issue was dedicated to formalization. The title of Brunschwig's article is 'La proposition particulière et les preuves de non-concluance chez Aristote'[2] (pp. 3–26). Lacan had already made use of the article in his text 'L'étourdit' with regard to female sexuation (Autres écrits, pp. 465–9, in reference to Aristotle, p. 469; see too 'Television' in Television/A Challenge to the Psychoanalytic Establishment, Norton, 1990, pp. 39–41).

Interpreting the delicate key passage at the start of the Prior Analytics, I, i, 24a, 18–20, Brunschwig draws a distinction between the particular negative that he calls minimal (at least some A is not B, it not being excluded that no A is B), and the particular negative that he calls maximal (at least, and, at most, some A is not B). He stresses that Aristotle always interprets the particular in the former, minimal, sense and rejects the latter.

In what way is the first minimal and the second maximal? The first does not exclude the possibility of a universal relationship between A and B (which would be: no A is B), while the second does exclude this possibility. In the second case one can say neither 'all A' nor 'no A'. There is no universal truth of A.

Contrary to Aristotle, Lacan holds onto the maximal sense of the particular negative, and with it equips his not-all.[3] He assigns this to woman's side of sexuation: there is no 'all the women', there is no universal womanliness, there is no Woman prefixed by a definite article (La femme).

The not-all is, however, more wily still. Lacan does not retain the maximal/minimal opposition without adding some of his own handiwork, as he does for the metaphor/metonymy pair that he got from Jakobson.

Aristotelian quantification is inscribed into a universe of discourse that is finite. Therefore, whether maximal or minimal, Aristotle's not-all plays only on lack and incompleteness: are they all there? Are some of them elsewhere? Lacan's not-all is deployed on the contrary in an infinite universe, and it is constructed on the intuitionistic model of a choice sequence: the emphasis shifts to the impossibility of stating the universality of the predicate. If the law of the formation of the series (all As are B) has not been posited at the outset, however far the series is pursued, and even if from one moment to the next it has been confirmed that there is no A that is not B, it will be impossible ever to conclude that this is the case for them all. As such, the sequence is lawless.

This singular attribute is recognized by Lacan as the real that he invents (see p. 118). This is not his only heresy.

§ 5. Sublimation = escabeau

Haeresis, p. 7: Lacan uses the Latin word due to the consonance between hérésie and the pronunciation of the letters RSI. The word has a Greek root, αἵρεσις, 'choice', hence 'particular opinion'.

What choice is at issue here? I have done my best to make it as clear as possible in the established text. The choice lies between what Lacan cheerily designates in terms of sinthome masaquinas and sinthome roule. These are, respectively, the orthodox 'sinthome' and the heretical 'sinthome'.

Indeed, heresy is not alone in constituting a sinthome. The choice that Lacan lauds in The Sinthome, that of the standpoint that here we are calling heretical, actually implies that orthodoxy (the normal) is just a particular regime of the sinthome, just as a 'lawful'[4] sequence that is normative and regular is nothing but a 'lawless' sequence that was given a formation law at the outset (the Name-of-the-Father) so as to avoid any suspense or surprise (what a bore!).

The sinthome roule is the sinthome that has been stripped right back in its structure and in its real; the masaquinas, or madaquin in French, is the sinthome elevated to semblance, the sinthome that has become a mannequin, and which is veiled by the sublimations that are available in the storehouse of accessories: Being and its radiance, the true, the good, the beautiful, and so on.

The elevatory means of sublimation as an upward operation was often named by Lacan using the well-known Hegelian term Aufhebung. In his written text 'Joyce the Symptom' he gives it the more expressive name escabeau (Autres écrits, pp. 565–70).

The escabeau shifts the emphasis to the body. Likewise, Lacan designates the sinthome as an 'event of the body' (ibid., p. 569), whereas he defined the Freudian symptom as 'truth' (Écrits, pp. 234–5). Joyce, a 'heretic', a partisan of the sinthome-rolling-along-any-old-how, 'strips the sinthome of its masaquinism' (p. 6). But this does not prevent him from wanting to haul himself, with his sinthome, onto the 'S.K.beau' of the work of art.

This same orientation leads Lacan to make us understand, on pp. 117–18, that what is real about straightness is that it is bent, that the bent aspect takes precedence over the straightness, that the straight is merely one kind of bend. Need I remind the reader that orthodoxy is, etymologically speaking, the opinion that is said to be 'right', 'proper' or 'straight'? 'Straight' is the antonym of 'gay', and thus means 'in conformity' or 'on the level'.

The passage from straightness to bendiness, from mos geometricus to nodal topology, is reminiscent of the Keplerian passage 'from the imaginary of the so-called "perfect" form, that of the circle, to the articulation of the conical, of the ellipse' ('Radiophonie' in Autres écrits, p. 431).

Einstein and Lenin are associated under the cover of this theme. The physicist made evident, if I may say so, the real curve of the ray of light, which nevertheless looks like it is straight. As for the revolutionary, defending the theses of What is to be Done?, published in March 1902, against the economist Martynov, he stated in the conclusion to his 'Speech on the Party Programme' on 22 July (4 August 1903) at the second Congress of the Russian Social Democratic Labour Party:

> We all know now that the 'economists' bent the stick in one direction. In order to make the stick straight it was necessary to bend the stick in the other direction, and that is what I did. I am sure that Russian Social Democracy will always straighten the stick that is bent by any kind of opportunism of any kind, and that our stick will therefore always be straight as possible and as ready as possible for action. (Lenin, V. I., Polnoe sobranie sochineniia, Vol. VII, fifth edition, Moscow, 1958–1965, p. 272[5])

Lenin later came back to this point, in 1907 in his 'Preface to the collection Twelve Years' (ibid., Vol. XVI):

> [T]he expression I used – and it has since been frequently quoted – was that the Economists had bent the stick in one direction. What is to be Done? I said, straightens out the stick that had been bent by the Economists. I emphasized that precisely because we were so vigorously straightening out the stick, our line of action would always be the straightest.

I think that Lacan often practised the Leninist method to which he refers in this passage of The Sinthome, and that a number of theses he put forward in psychoanalysis are to be read in this light: he bends back the stick that had been bent by the 'orthodox', so that it will be straight again.

When on p. 137 of the French edition of The Seminar Book XXIII Lacan speaks of a bâton instead of a barre, it may be supposed that this is due to contamination from the Cartesian example in the 'Dioptrique' of the illusion of a stick in water. I have chosen not to correct this mistake in the established text.

The unprecedented couple of Einstein and Lenin becomes a trio when, in the last of the questions posed to Lacan (p. 120), an object emerges that held a great deal of fascination at the time: Lacan's twisted cigar. This cigar was a mild Havana known as a culebra. The Davidoff tobacco shop in Geneva (where the 1903 RSDLP Congress was held. How odd! What a coincidence!) used to sell them fastened together in threes.

One knew that one could please Lacan by bringing back a box of them for him. This pleasure helped him to 'stand upright', as Sollers would say, while some lay in wait for him to choke himself with his knot (in particular the person mentioned at the end of § 16).

§ 6. From Schreber to Joyce

One contributor whom Lacan often drafted in for a helping hand in the 1970s was Nicole Sels, mentioned on p. 8. She was the secretary of the École freudienne de Paris, which Lacan founded and directed, and she always displayed great bibliographic skill. She co-translated the French edition of Präsident Schreber's Memoirs of my Nervous Illness (Mémoires d'un névropathe, published by Seuil).

The text of the Memoirs and Lacan's reading thereof in Seminar III and 'On a question preliminary to any possible treatment of psychosis' (Écrits, pp. 531–83) lie in the background of The Sinthome. The 'dropping of the relationship with the body' (p. 129) refers to the state of dereliction that is designated in Schreber's delusion by the term liegen lassen, which Lacan isolates as a fundamental feature of psychosis, and which he translates as laisser en plan (see 'On a question preliminary . . .', Écrits, p. 560 and p. 563).[6]

Another of the modalities of this letting drop is to be met in the structure of the passage à l'acte: Lacan speaks of the (se) laisser tomber of the subject, which translates the niederkommen lassen from the Freudian case of the young homosexual woman (Anxiety, pp. 109–16). Defenestration in melancholia is the most striking clinical illustration of this.

Who, or what, falls in the letting drop? It is not the pure subject of the signifier, for this subject is weightless; gravity does not act upon this subject. It is the subject insofar as his Being is lodged in the object a. The body is necessarily involved.

§ 7. On a Cantoresque body

Page 10 offers a cursory summary of Lacan's reading of Cantor's definition of the set, the first axioms of his theory, and their initial consequences. I will have to begin by setting out its basic elements.

Let the primary relation R*, which is not defined here, be that of membership of a set. If x is a member of the set A (i.e. is an element of the set, is contained within it), we write: $x \in A$. The set A that contains precisely two elements, a and b, is written: $\{a, b\}$.

The axiom of extensionality (here noted M*) posits that a set is defined by its elements: two sets are equal iff they have the same elements. On the basis of this axiom, one can define a second relation, R, which this time is a relation between sets, and this is the relation of inclusion. For two sets A and B, if all the elements of the first are also in the second, A is said to be a subset of B, or is included in B. This is written: $A \subset B$ or, reflexively, $B \supset A$.

These two relations, of membership and inclusion, are utterly distinct.

It is now a matter of assuring the existence of a set containing precisely the elements that correspond to the definition.

It is not enough to say that to any definition D of an element there corresponds a set S whose elements are exactly the elements x that correspond to D. This axiom would give rise to Russell's paradox if D should only be: $x \in x$. Therefore, one has to ensure beforehand that the elements x defined by D are all, as it were, settable elements, those which the axiom will guarantee already to lie in some set.

In other words, one shall allow each x to become a member of E only once one has made sure in advance that x is already a member of some set A that has no other virtue, no other definition, besides that of being supposed (but not posited) to pre-exist. In this way, one is making sure of the regularity of each element x that is a candidate for being in E and, by way of consequence, the regularity of E itself. Any set E so formed will be a subset of a set A.

This signifying expenditure is the price that has to be paid in order to circumvent the Russellian curse and to show any irregular elements and paradoxical sets to the door of the universe. The goal is that everything should keep turning smoothly round, if I may express it thus (see below, § 8).

We shall call a definition of x: 'condition S (x)' (in other, more technical, terms: a sentence S in which the letter x appears at least once in a free state, i.e. extrinsic to the particular quantifier, 'there exists an x', and the universal quantifier, 'for all x').

We now introduce the axiom known as the axiom of specification (M), which posits that to every set A and to every condition S (x) there corresponds a set B whose elements are exactly those elements x of A for which S (x) holds.

The first consequence of this axiom is that it ensures the innocuousness of the Russellian phenomenon. Should it take your fancy, you can very well form a set R whose members are not included in themselves, i.e. that corresponds to the condition $x \notin x$ (the catalogues that are not part of themselves, of august memory), since R will not be included in A: $R \notin A$ (the demonstration is left to the reader).

Since A is just any set, R is thus what is 'absent in any set', if we may be allowed to use a somewhat Mallarmean turn of phrase, hence the saying, worthy of Parmenides, if not of Heraclitus, that we owe to Halmos: 'nothing contains everything'. Lacan took up this sentence in the form: 'Nothing is everything' (Halmos likewise says, 'there is no universe'; see Paul Halmos, Naive Set Theory, Van Nostrand, 1960, pp. 6–7).

Correlatively, there appears what is 'present in every set', if I may say so, which is the empty set, denoted $\varnothing$.

For the empty set to exist, all it takes is for at least one set to exist, though this requires that it be posited and, in order to do so, that we change dimension (the mension of the dit), because our definitions and axioms do not say anything about what is. They only tell us what it is called and what it resembles, to the extent that a set may very well have no more existence than a unicorn.

So, let's creationize: there exits a set.

Everything has now been consummated. Given M, there exists a set without any elements, which is known as the empty set. Given M*, there exists just one empty set. Given the definition of R, this empty set is a subset of any set: $\varnothing \subset A$. By virtue of this same definition, any set is a subset of itself: $A \subset A$.

Now we come to the Lacanian reading of all this little machinery.

Phase one. Take an object, the simplest object, 1 all alone. Is it even a number? It is a single mark on a piece of paper, any old one, but it can be a member of a set, it is capable of being an element in a set, though it has not yet been put in a set. There is nothing more than that, 1.

Phase two. Put it in a set: $\{1\}$.

Phase three. Form the set of its subsets. What is that? By virtue of the machine constructed above, it is a set of two elements: $\{\{1\}, \varnothing\}$. Since in the case of a set with one element the set and this element can easily be confused, we rewrite this: $\{1, \varnothing\}$.

This is the set that is at issue on p. 10 of The Sinthome.

Here you can see how, with something of 1, you have created something of 2. You had just a single one, the first one all by itself, then in a second phase you had the one included in a set, and then, as if by some miracle, a one-to-boot (Lacan dixit) which is the empty set, ∅.

This is why Lacan says that the set, the Cantorian bag, is fit 'to be connoted with an ambiguity between 1 and 0', which expresses how the empty set contains zero elements, but thereby remains no less of a one, as one set. An empty bag is still one bag.

This is no miracle. There is no creation ex nihilo. The rabbit had already been placed in the top hat. What we find in the shape of the empty set is what we ourselves added to the one-all-alone in the form of the set into which we inscribed it in the second phase.

Lacan had already concluded elsewhere (see 'Radiophonie', op. cit., p. 409) that the empty set is the Other as the locus of any signifying inscription, and that its first form, if one may say so, is the body, the body that has been emptied of jouissance. He clarifies this here, on p. 10, by suggesting that the very concept (Begriff) of the set might have been envisaged on the basis of the body and its highly particular unity, which is the unity of the one-to-boot. This is what distinguishes the Lacanian body from the Aristotelian body.

For Aristotle, as Lacan stresses in Encore, the body is the model of the one. This one, however, is the individual, that is to say, the one-all-alone. Moreover, Lacan will enquire into the true origin of the signifier One (pp. 111–12). His answer lies here, on this page of The Sinthome, in the suggestion that the body might be the model, the imaginary origin, not of the one-all-alone, which is a signifier, a mark, a trait, or a cut, but of the one-to-boot, which is the empty set. This is quite simply a way of saying that the body exists as a bag of skin, apart and aside from its organs.

The word I have just written is the one that lets us grasp what is at issue, grounding the exact site at which the lucubration of a mysterious 'body without organs', which is central to Anti-Oedipus (G. Deleuze and F. Guattari, Minuit, 1972; English trans. Viking, 1977), ought to be inscribed. The body without organs is the bag-body. Its ex-sistence relative to the elements that it contains, its consistence as a container, is that of the empty set in the formula: {1, ∅}.

This is what Lacan allows us to understand by following up with the Cantorian pair (these being the two elements 1 and ∅). However, the set that includes them stands in third place, hence the text: '[. . .] Cantor's theory has to start afresh from the pair, but then the set stands in third place.'

In the initial one-all-alone, Lacan invites us to acknowledge the S_1, the master signifier, and in that of the second phase, which is inscribed into the set, the S_2. The first is the unary trait, the second is the symbol. While the first indicates the empty set, the second indicates that 'it is a pair', the very pair 1, ∅, of which it is an element.

A good deal more may be said about this rather dense page, but it seems to me that this will suffice to make the kind of attention that Lacan's intelligence requires tangible for the reader, above all in Lacan's late teaching which is teeming with so many things said and so many things to be said, the enunciation of which plays out across several pitches, and the statement of which plays several hands at once.

The most pertinent references are not always the most explicit ones, and no index of names will ever detect them. One would need an index of all that is not said: back-of-the-mind thoughts, cryptic allusions, resonances, and other invisibilia. Actually, I might just have a go at it one day by way of example.

Thus, one might wonder, for instance, why there is a development focussed on Adam and Eve at the start of The Sinthome. The answer is that the first words of Finnegans Wake are: 'riverrun, past Eve and Adam's . . .'

The day when there are Lacanians in the university just as now there are Joyceans, when 'to be Lacanian' will mean the same thing as 'to be Joycean', namely, to be possessed by a love of the text, there can be no doubting that they will have much on their plate. This day will surely come, but should it be eagerly anticipated and hastened on? They will soon find themselves turning round in circles.

§ 8. Hegel and the police

Hegel, mentioned on page 16, devotes paragraphs 231 to 249 of Elements of the Philosophy of Right to the police. The final paragraph of the section opens with the sentence:

> The universal, which is contained in the particularity of the civic community, is realized and preserved by the external system of police supervision, whose purpose is simply to protect and secure the multitude of private ends and interests subsisting within it.

This is what Lacan, going straight to the crux of the matter, translates as: 'For the police, it is simply a matter of keeping things turning round', which gives a familiar and eloquent form to the notion that has been pompously rendered in French as existence stable dans l'universel (translation by Robert Derathé, Vrin, 1975, p. 254).

If Hegel speaks of stable existence in the universal, what might mobile existence in the particular be? It might be travel, for example.

§ 9. Lacan and his Americans

During his trip to the United States, mentioned at the start of the second chapter (p. 17), Lacan was to give several lectures, the transcripts of which were published in the journal Scilicet (Seuil, Issue 6/7, 1976). Quine dedicates a paragraph of his autobiography to his meeting with Lacan at MIT, where his talk was also attended by Jakobson and Octavio Paz (The Time of my Life, MIT Press, 1985, pp. 416–17).

'Quine is no fool', says Lacan on page 29; indeed, because he made such a good impression on Lacan. Quine was exceedingly courteous: I remember seeing him unruffled by the joint insults issued by Jean Dieudonné and Georg Kreisel during a colloquium at the École normale supérieure. He knew how to conceal from Lacan the fact that he had understood nothing of his talk and his conversation, to the point that he was relieved not to be seated next to him during a dinner in honour of the master, the 'new rage of the Paris cafés'.

At MIT, Lacan met Chomsky (p. 21). Following a pointer from Jakobson, Lacan was one of the first in France, if not the first, to speak about Syntactic Structures (Mouton, 1964), almost as soon as it came out, and about the now famous example of 'colourless green ideas . . .' (at the start of Seminar XII, 1964–1965). When he met Chomsky during his US trip, the renowned linguist's theses on language, such as the 'mental organ', were not yet as widely known as they would be later on following the publication of Rules and Representations (Columbia, 1980). We may also note that the translator of Aspects of the Theory of Syntax (MIT, 1965) is also a former attendee of Lacan's Seminar (Jean-Claude Milner).

Likewise, the first collection of texts by the American logician Charles Sanders Peirce (p. 5 and p. 102) to appear in French was translated by someone close to the Seminar. Lacan regularly drew on Peirce's Collected Papers, which he had also come to via Jakobson. Lacan borrowed his logical quadrant from Peirce, which he used for the first time in Seminar XI. To Peirce he also owes the definition of the sign (a sign represents something for someone), which he transposed into his paradoxical definition of the signifier (a signifier represents the subject for another signifier).

Conveyance from one signifier to another introduces widespread falsification into the 'world' (and this explains why, for example, we meet a certain Fals in the extraordinary picaresque novel Femmes, Gallimard, 1983, which is so very Lacanian, especially in its title; see § 4).

§ 10. Critique of authenticity

What is the 'brief passage' on echt (which translates as 'authentic' or 'genuine') that Lacan is thinking of on page 69?

We can easily see what might have caught his attention in section 60 of Being and Time, 'The Existential Structure of the Authentic Potentiality-of-Being Attested to in Conscience'[7], in particular the sentence on the modification of the disclosing of the 'world' by 'echt disclosedness' (Stambaugh, p. 282; MacQuarrie and Robinson, pp. 297–8).[8]

Heidegger is, of course, one of the 'few Germans' mentioned on page 70.[9] I no longer recall whether I had passed on to Lacan the anti-Heideggerian pamphlet by Adorno, The Jargon of Authenticity (1964), which I read in the English-language translation that came out in 1973. The Joycean scorn of Aquinian claritas on p. 6 (and here in § 5), the critique of 'evidence' on pp. 93–5, the critique of 'intensional truth', and the distinction between the true and the real on p. 132, all motion in the same direction as an objection raised against Heideggerian authenticity.

In Lacan, the modification, not of the disclosing of the 'world', but of the cutting-out of the object a, is due to the invention of new signifiers, as we shall see.

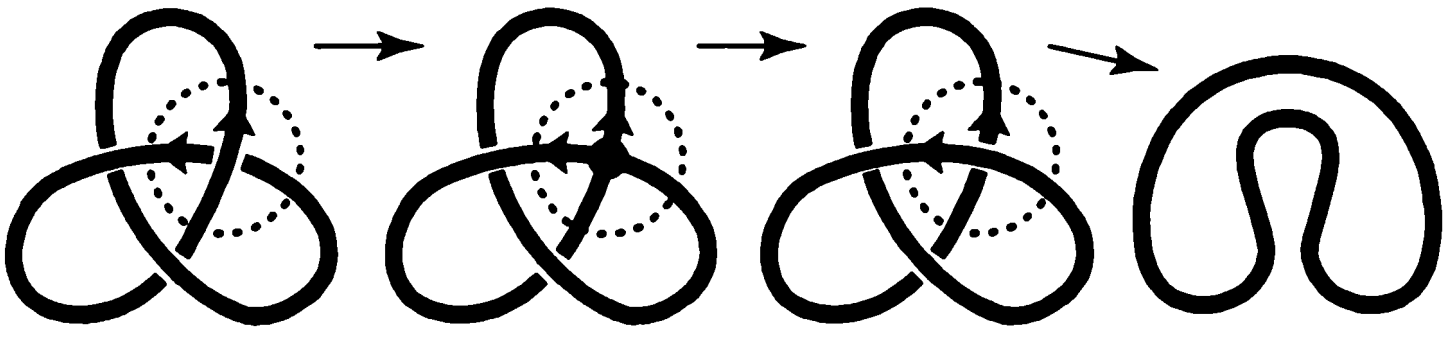
§ 11. The lapsus of the knot

The theme of the nodal error, or the 'lapsus of the knot', on p. 75, along with its 'mending', is central to The Sinthome; it is to be found again in the final chapter.

What Lacan calls 'mistake' carries the function, in chapter VI, pp. 75–6, of a transformation that possesses the property of unknotting the trefoil knot and turning it into a mere ring of string. We may add in this regard that it was precisely the study of this kind of transformation that in 1990 enabled a Russian mathematician from Saint Petersburg, Victor Vassiliev, from the school of Vladimir Arnold, to make a breakthrough in the mathematical theory of knots.

The principal mathematical treatment of the question runs as follows: the said 'mistake' is defined as a singularity (a catastrophe in Thom's sense) which occurs when one part of the knot cuts another transversally at a 'double point'; at that instant, the knot becomes singular, then immediately reverts to an ordinary knot, but one that may be different from the initial knot.

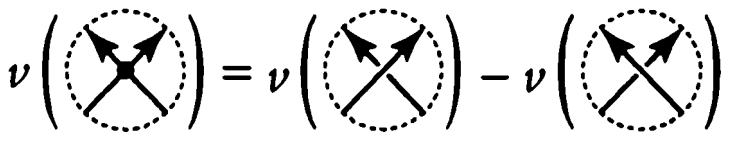
The most straightforward example is furnished precisely by the transformation that Lacan shows: undergoing a catastrophe, the trefoil knot becomes a singular knot at a 'double point', only to become immediately a 'trivial' knot, labelled ○ (the ring of string). Passing through a double point is the mathematical translation of the act of cutting and splicing the string.



Vassiliev's originality was to consider the knots as points of a larger and more structured set. In his theory, the ordinary knots form a subset denoted by Σ_0, whereas the others form the infinite family Σ, which is broken up into strata Σ_1, Σ_2, Σ_3, . . . constituted of singular knots with 1, 2, 3, . . . double points, respectively.

Vassiliev quite naturally chose the sigma symbol to designate the strata. This coincidence (and it is no more than that, I implore you not to read any meaning into it) is strange for the reader of the Seminar because this is also the letter that Lacan uses to denote the sinthome.

The Vassiliev invariants allow a knot to be distinguished on the basis of the path that leads through the strata to ○, in accordance with the number of double points that separate it from the trivial state. Each invariant is a function that, for each double point in a singular knot, satisfies the following relation:



The theory only becomes nontrivial from the second-order invariants onward. To distinguish between the trefoil knot and the trivial knot, one such invariant is sufficient, labelled v_0. For the trivial knot, it is equal to zero: v_0 (○) = 0. This same invariant assigns the value 1 to the trefoil knot, in accordance with the calculation that is illustrated by the following diagram, in which one can recognize the properties explored by Lacan in chapter VI:

In this note I have been following the exposition set out on pp. 90–99 of the book by Sossinsky cited above in § 3. The three illustrations are taken from the same. The reader of The Sinthome will surely find this book most informative; I also recommend consulting The KnotPlot Site, the most attractive website dedicated to the knots (www.knotplot.com).

It would be preposterous to imagine that mathematicians should owe anything whatsoever to psychoanalysts, but it appears that it was indeed a psychoanalyst who became attached to knots that have an effect of singularity (already isolated by Lord Kelvin, see § 3) some fifteen years before they turned out to be the inroad to an important breakthrough in mathematical theory. Nothing more than that, but nothing less either.

The history of knots will certainly find a place for Lacan on account of his many years of tenacious experimentation. The fact that this experimentation was not highly formalized is no obstacle to this. It was in just such a way that a New York lawyer who had been manipulating pieces of cord on his living-room floor, just as Lacan used to do in his office at rue de Lille or on the ground at Guitrancourt, discovered that two of the knots listed in the 1899 Tait-Little table were actually the same. This was the last duplication of its kind to be discovered. The article in which he reports his finding was published in Proceedings of the American Mathematical Society, Vol. 45, Issue 2, August 1974, pp. 262–6.

Seeing Lacan play, on p. 76, with the idea of a 'Lacan's knot', there can be no doubting that he would have been delighted to make a discovery comparable with Kenneth A. Perko Jr's find.

§ 12. The circle of Popillius

The episode of the circle of Popillius, mentioned on p. 91, is a topos of Roman history that was popularized in the classical age by Charles Rollin's Histoire ancienne (1730–1738). In the 1740 edition it was illustrated with a print by J.-P. Le Bas, 'Antiochus enfermé dans un cercle par Popilius'.

The source is Livy Book XLV (12.5); it can also be found in the Epitome of the Philippic History of Pompeius Trogus by Justin (XXXIV, 3, 1–4). Here is the translation in English:[10]

> Accordingly Popillius was despatched, in the character of ambassador, to Antiochus, to desire him 'to refrain from invading Egypt, or, if he had already entered it, to quit without delay.' Having found him in Egypt, and the king having offered to kiss him (for Antiochus, when he was a hostage at Rome, had been friendly with Popillius among others), Popillius said that 'private friendship must be set aside, when the commands of his country stood in the way,' and having produced and delivered to him the decree of the senate, but observing that he hesitated, and referred the consideration of it to his friends, he drew a circle round him with a staff which he carried in his hand, so large that it also enclosed his friends, and desired him 'to decide on the spot, and not to go out of that ring, till he had given an answer to the senate whether he would have peace or war with Rome.' This firmness so daunted the king's spirit, that he replied that 'he would obey the senate.'

The episode belongs to the most turbulent part of the history of the Seleucids under Roman influence, prior to the Syrian kingdom being reduced to the status of a province. This is the period from which Corneille borrowed the plot of Rodogune (one can read with interest Corneille's preface and the note by Georges Couton, as well as the genealogical note on p. 1293, in Tome III of the Œuvres complètes, Gallimard, 'Bibliothèque de la Pléiade').

First of all, we should not confuse the Popillius Laenas of the circle with Cicero's assassin of the same name, who was stigmatized by Voltaire in the Dictionnaire philosophique and has a small role in Shakespeare's Julius Caesar (played in the 1953 Mankiewicz film by an actor of whom a great deal could be said). I do not know the degree of kinship between the two homonyms, but it cannot be impossible to determine.

As for the 'encircled' one, he is none other than Antiochus IV Epiphanes. Why yes, the very same who, prevented by the said 'circle of Popillius' from launching an invasion of Egypt, began the persecution of the Jews. As Bossuet writes quite superbly in his Universal History:

> Antiochus Illustris reigned like a mad-man: he bent all his fury against the Jews, and attempted to destroy the temple, the law of Moses, and the whole nation. The authority of the Romans kept him from making himself master of Egypt.[11]

As we know, the Maccabean revolt forced him to put off his anti-Jewish plan, and the Temple was cleansed in 164, an episode that is still joyfully commemorated in Jewish tradition by the feast of Ḥanukkah.

The Fine Arts Museum in Rennes holds a very fine drawing by Rembrandt, 'Popillius and Antiochus' (c. 1660): the consul, a modest Popillius clothed in a tunic, stooped and alone, draws in the sand the circle that surrounds a superb and richly brocaded Antiochus, under the watchful eye of his immobile cavalrymen and the attentive crowd, who are also forming a circle.

I am inclined to think that Lacan's familiar references to the circle of Popillius (this is not the only one) are a memory of some school textbook or illustrated volume from his childhood, perhaps the children's edition of the aforementioned Rollin or a book that was inspired by it. Rollin's Histoire ancienne, with its Épinal prints, as it were, maintained a strong influence throughout the nineteenth century and was still being recommended in 1900 by the eminent Rawlinson (see the article by Pierre Briant on 'La tradition gréco-romaine sur Alexandre le Grand dans l'Europe moderne et contemporaine', in Haagsma, M., et al, The Impact of Classical Greece on European and National Identities, Amsterdam: J. C. Gieben, 2003, pp. 161–80).

I would certainly have caught Lacan's interest with the recently advanced hypothesis from Peter O'Neill ('Going Round in Circles: Popular Speech in Ancient Rome', in Classical Antiquity, Vol. 22, No. 1, 2003, pp. 135–66, especially footnote 7) which holds that Livy's use of the word circulus in the episode of the said 'circle of Popillius' was most likely the 'retrojecting' of a term that was in vogue during the late Republic, not in the geometrical sense but in the metaphorical sense of a human 'meeting' or 'congregation'. The multiplication of unofficial, unauthorized, or even dissenting and conspiratorial circuli marked the lifestyle of the time, and did not fail to cause anxiety for the senatorial authorities and the 'establishment' as a whole. In the Livian fable of Popillius, the circle becomes, on the contrary, the pure signifying materialization of a senatorial power that is all the more insistent given that it is physically absent.

Rembrandt lets us see quite marvellously the sudden Aufhebung that transforms the sign of Popillius' weakness, the staff of his old age, the incarnation of his castration – in short, his long, bare cane – into the instrument of his triumph, into an astounding master-signifier capable of imposing its empire over the most presumptuous realities in the person of a fiercely reigning king, holding him back from upsetting what Hegel called 'stable existence in the universal' (§ 8). Rome devoted itself, ultimately exhausting itself, to spreading this 'stable existence' across the world as though it were to be the world's police, which is exactly what has become, and shall become again, we may suppose, of other empires throughout history.

The circle of Popillius is thus the illustration of the 'turning round in circles' that forms the sum and substance of the police vision of the world. Looking back, this is the occasion to confirm Lacan's perennial thesis that while power is the attribute of the master, his intimate truth is impotence (see Chapter VI in The Other Side of Psychoanalysis, titled 'The castrated master'; see too page 174 in Chapter XX, except that here, with regard to the sign of the master, it is not that 'everybody jumps', but that one individual becomes immobilized).

To my mind this is precisely what makes the 'megalomaniacal dream', the 'all-pervasive will to power', the idea of submitting to the university, and even the aspiration to be 'sacred', which Philippe Sollers oddly attributes to Lacan in the interview mentioned in § 1, altogether doubtful. As I knew him, and as I understand him, Lacan offered a lesson of sobriety and lucidity with regard to power, to the point that he left it to others to negotiate the balance of power with the IPA. We know the price he paid for this (his 'excommunication').

Imputing to Lacan the desire to be sacred seems hard to reconcile with the Lacanian heresy of the escabeau (§ 5), though this desire is liable to come quite naturally, through a retroactive effect, to great French writers, be they infamous or idolized. We have only to cite the Dieu Voltaire, Jean-Jacques, the Divin Marquis, l'Enchanteur, and more generally the romantic cult of the vates writer such as it has been traced out by Paul Bénichou in the admirable works that have followed on from The Consecration of the Writer, 1750–1830 (the original French text, published by José Corti in 1973, bears the subtitle: 'Essai sur l'avènement d'un pouvoir spirituel laïque dans la France moderne' [Essay on the advent of a secular spiritual power in modern-day France]). One can also think of Joyce as the Redeemer or as grist to the mill for academics, as 'canonical fodder', dare I say (see here, p. 8 and pp. 64–5). The desire for sacredness has its place, too, in Bataille's erotic theosophy, that of Madame Edwarda and the 'unavowable community' (see Lacan's reference to Bataille in the Écrits, p. 583, and I am fully aware of the irritation this reference has caused Sollers).

Nevertheless, and to pay tribute to Sollersian intuition which in my eyes is never without interest, I will gladly admit that Lacan's policy might indeed appear to be akin to that of the God of the Jews such as he is evoked in the first lesson of On the Names-of-the-Father (see the small volume that was recently published with this title, p. 85): Lacan's doctrine is not the only one in psychoanalysis, it claims nothing more than to be the only one to reign in its own little corner, his little School. There, it is 'jealous'. Lacan himself readily and laughingly accepted this risky analogy in one of our private conversations. On the other hand, the lovely yet more dangerous idea of a universal domination of minds is to be rendered to the Roman and Papist ideology where it first took root.

To conclude this excursus, I shall add that I see nothing exorbitant in a major Catholic writer in present-day France, a current legatee of the glorious 'spiritual power' of literature that took over from a Christian vocation whose values, today restored, had back then fallen into obsolescence (Bénichou, op. cit., p. 342), being led to a particularly exalted conception of his function and his gifts once he has assumed the difficult happiness of 'being oneself' rather than someone else. Contrary to what the writer's apparent ease and proclaimed felicity would have us believe, both of which actually stem more from iron discipline than any hypothetical Gascony good nature, the assumption of his calling did not go without saying for Philippe Sollers, as his remark in the afore-cited interview can vouch: 'I truly believe that it's better to be a great writer than to be Lacan'. Just turn to page 115 (passim) of the 'Folio' edition of Femmes cited above: one can read the transposed testimony of Sollers's decision, circa 1970, 'cut to the quick, to show them that I too was a thinker'.

Let us now look at the Popillian circle in terms of the empty set from earlier.

Popillius only forms a pair with the overweening eastern monarch by separating him from his organs, his advisory and military organs,[12] and by deflating his air chamber until it is reduced to an empty bladder. This is how, as Epiphanes fades away, or at least as all the life drains from him, for it is as though he has been entombed – think of Saddam Hussein, unearthed from the ground – the multitude comes to form a circle. The circle of Popillius thus fulfils Daniel's prophecy.

The apologue certainly allows for more than one reading.

One might be tempted to develop themes in a classical vein, such as Joyce enclosed in a knot by Lacan, or, inversely, Lacan enclosed in a knot by Joyce, or even, Lacan enclosed in Joyce by Jacques Aubert, if one were to forget that this kind of enclosing only carries meaning in a Euclidian metrical space, the only space that the police in 'The Purloined Letter' move about in. The police fail to spot the paradoxical relationships, even the singularities, that are authorized by topology, and which are required, for instance, by the Freudian Lust-Ich, the pleasure-ego, which as Lacan points out on pp. 133–4 has no exterior (see in this regard, for example, The Four Fundamental Concepts of Psychoanalysis, pp. 239–41, and Encore, pp. 55–6).

The triviality of the Popillian circle is met in the triviality of the separate rings that each give rise to a 'turning round in circles', to a particular enclosing, but it disappears when the fourfold Borromean nodality is established between them by means of the sinthome and, further still, the false nodality (of the final chapter).

This can be transposed onto the clinical plane. One can say, then, in the style of Vassiliev, that the said normality results from the trivializing transformation of a higher-stratum knot. Herein lies the demonstration of The Sinthome. It is topological. It requires the use of non-Euclidian spaces.

§ 13. Other spaces

Lacan often makes reference, as he does on pp. 68–9, to the paradox of symmetrical objects, which featured in Kant's Inaugural Dissertation of 1770 (De Mundi Sensibilis atque Intelligibilis Forma et Principiis, Section 3, § 15; p. 396 in Theoretical Philosophy, 1755–1770, translated by D. Walford, Cambridge University Press, 1992). Lacan never tires of stressing the limited character of the transcendental aesthetic, which is fundamentally inadequate for subjective experience.

Likewise, as on p. 96, Lacan often comes back to Desargues, his projective geometry and his point at infinity, which is axiomatically forbidden in Euclidism. When Les Mots et les Choses came out in 1966, Lacan used Desargues in his Seminar XIII to analyse in his own way Las Meninas by Velásquez, following in the footsteps of Foucault who was present at the session. Foucault's now famous commentary opens his book.

Lacan was acquainted with two landmark texts by René Taton, L'Œuvre mathématique de Desargues and La Géométrie projective en France de Desargues à Poncelet (PUF, 1951). One may also consult the excellent books by Judith V. Field, professor of art history at Birkbeck College, University of London, The Geometrical Work of Girard Desargues (New York/Berlin, Springer, 1987), co-edited with J. J. Gray, and The Invention of Infinity: Mathematics and Art in the Renaissance (Oxford, 1997). It may be noted that in his treatise on projective geometry, the 1639 Rough Draft, Desargues calls 'trunk' (tronc) a straight line cut by several other straight lines (rameaux, 'branches'), and 'node' (nœud) the point at which a branch intersects a trunk.

This fact would surely have interested Lacan, since he was not averse to underlining, on p. 99, that his text 'The signification of the phallus' (Écrits, p. 685) begins with the sentence: 'We know that the unconscious castration complex has the function of a knot . . .'

§ 14. From Madame du Châtelet to Madame Blavatsky

We know that Newton fired the loins of the glitterati of his time.

Lacan revisits Newton on several occasions in his teaching (p. 104). In The Ethics of Psychoanalysis, p. 76, he attributes the invention of the categorical imperative, and the invention of a practical reason whose motives are detached from any sensible interest, to 'the disorienting effect of Newtonian physics [. . .], a physics that has reached a point of independence relative to das Ding, to the human Ding.'

In the fourth part of 'Radiophonie' (Autres écrits, pp. 415–31), following the footsteps of Koyré he dedicates several pages to the 'astronomic revolution', in which he sees a three-phase thought process: Copernicus, Galileo, and Newton. He reads the terminal point of the process (Newton) as the 'instant of seeing' of a new process whose two successive steps have yet to come (p. 422). He thereby implies that Freud, by making do with his reference to Copernicus, betrays how he has limited the scope of his discovery of the unconscious. This Newtonian theme is taken up again in 'Television' (op. cit., p. 36).

As for the marquise du Châtelet, 'the divine Émilie' of the Voltaire who spent fifteen years at her side in the château de Cirey, to whom he dedicated the lines, Si vous voulez que j'aime encore, / Rendez-moi l'âge des amours . . . ['If you would have me love once more, / Restore to me the age of amours'], it is traditional to portray her, unfairly, as a femme savante, when in fact she claims the fame of having translated the Principia into French. The two Causeries du lundi by Sainte-Beuve on 'Voltaire at Cirey' (17 June and 18 July 1850) still make for very fine reading, even though they have been surpassed by historians' research on this tumultuous liaison (René Vaillot, Madame du Châtelet, Albin Michel, 1978). The letters inspired by her passion for Saint-Lambert, the playboy who was friend to Rousseau and lover to Sophie d'Houdetot, were published by Louise Colet (yes indeed, Flaubert's mistress).

Though Lacan may scoff at the infatuation for the 'God Newton', he none the less points out that a rumpus of this order is only to be expected following the discovery of some 'odd or end of the real', precisely because it foretells a change in the way of the world, an interruption of the notorious 'turning round in circles'. Such was the case with the Freudian discovery.

In his repeated grumblings over the large crowd at his weekly Seminar at the law faculty on rue Saint-Jacques, grumblings which are far from being an expression of vanity, Lacan is actually lamenting how he had not succeeded in his stated ambition of discovering in turn a new 'odd or end of the real'. The presence of the droves around him strikes him as unwarranted, the sign of some imaginary obscenity. Perhaps, too, with their anticipation they pressed him to remain there, to stay rooted on the stage until he had made his find. This would make him the Antiochus of his audience, who in turn would serve as a Popillius.

He did not for all that wish for solitude. The right size for him would have been a small circle, if I may say so, of dedicated workers. So it is that we see him marvelling in The Sinthome at the dialogue between the two friends Soury and Thomé, or setting his son-in-law to work.

Voltaire's couple with the marquise clearly caused him greater difficulty. The recent feminist historiography has sought to revalorize her work, and quite rightly so. One recent article that is exceedingly clear-cut and compelling has stressed the extreme care of her translation and her continual effort to make the technical terms and abstract notions accessible to the public. (Might I say that here I consider myself to be a latter-day Émilie?) Another interesting read is Judith P. Zinsser's 'Translating Newton's Principia: The Marquise du Châtelet's Revision and Additions for a French Audience', Notes and Records of the Royal Society, London, 55(2), 2001, pp. 227–45.

Furthermore, attention has recently been drawn to a short work that was initially clandestine and condemned by the Church, then later softened down to be become a European bestseller, Il Newtonianismo per le dame, ovvero Dialoghi sopra la luce e i colori, Naples, 1737, by Francesco Algarotti, who presents Newtonian optics in a dialogue between the two sexes on Lake Garda, in the style of Le Bovier de Fontenelle. The Italian text can be consulted on the website of the University of Bologna[13]; on this topic one can also read a recent article by Massimo Mazzotti in the British Journal for the History of Science (2004) on the University of Cambridge website.

In short, the decried category of femme savante should not be an excuse to think that Mme du Châtelet and Madame Blavatsky are of the same stock.

Lacan cites the name of the latter and mocks her 'diffuse bleed' on the manvantara (p. 105). Since the life and work of the Russian theosophist are hardly familiar to the sectarians of Freud and Lacan, I think it will not be unhelpful to offer a brief sketch thereof, which owes everything to Textes théosophiques, Paris, without having been able to confirm the accuracy of any of the information since I am not aware of any critical biography.

Helena Petrovna was born in the Ukraine in 1831 while her father, Captain Von Hahn, was in the service of the Tsar. From an early age she displayed 'strange parapsychological aptitudes'. At eighteen she married Nikifor Blavatsky, whose name she would immortalize, though she left him three months later, still a virgin, fleeing on horseback to travel around the world (three times).

Helena visited the 'Redskins' and the Incas, before gaining access to 'the closed world of the high mystics in India and Tibet, and then the secret fellowships of the Druzes', where she was 'subjected many times to the most severe initiatory trials, from which she emerged gasping, but immoveable in her determination, all in the service of her Master's cause.' The said Master was an Indian Rajput, but this did not prevent her from maintaining close relations with Garibaldi, at whose side, at the battle of Mentana (1867), she would be wounded five times and left for dead. Once recovered, she set off for Florence, passing through Slovenia, staying in Tibet, finding herself in Greece, then in Cairo, Syria, Lebanon, Odessa, Budapest, then a brief spell at 11 rue de l'Université in Paris, before embarking for the United States.

In the US she met W. Q. Judge, a young lawyer of Irish origin (the Irish connection, Joyce!), who would become her loyal disciple. With him she founded the Theosophical Society in Manhattan (1875), and wrote her first book, Isis Unveiled, all 1,200 pages of it. It sold out in ten days. In it she condemns the sectarianism of scholars along with the spiritual monopoly that religion has arrogated to itself, and asserts the real existence of initiatory mysteries.

Having become an American citizen she set off for India where she created a journal. She became 'HPB' to her close ones, and headquartered in Madras (1883), before returning to Paris, 45 rue Notre-Dame-des-Champs, then roaming all over Europe, dining with Nubar Pasha in Cairo, astounding Gaston Maspero with the breadth of her knowledge, and finally going back to India.

Even though her last years were blighted by the cabal formed by a French couple and an investigator from the Society for Psychical Research, who accused her of having made various fraudulent claims, she found the strength to found the Blavatsky Lodge, whose Transactions shed new light on dreams; to create the magazine Lucifer, aiming to 'bring to light the hidden things of darkness'; and above all to issue to the public her 1,500-page Secret Doctrine (1888), followed by a popular compendium, The Key to Theosophy (1889). In it she recognizes mankind's profound soul, a transpersonal core of consciousness underlying the ephemeral structure of the personal ego. This is said to constitute the nucleus of a veritable brotherhood of humanity, allowing for a global awareness.

Mme Blavatsky then succumbed to a nasty bout of flu (London, 1891).

Among the members of her Society were: Edison, the astronomer Camille Flammarion, the Russian chancellor Aksakof, Rudolf Steiner the founder of anthroposophy, W. B. Yeats (Ireland again) and Mondrian. Among the personalities who were close to theosophy or inspired by it, besides Joyce himself, were: Kandinsky, Malevich, Klee, Scriabin, D. H. Lawrence, T. S. Eliot and Henry Miller.

The latter testified to the effect of 'subjective rectification' (cf. Écrits, p. 601) that he obtained reading Blavatsky's work:

> I was hypnotized by her eyes and I had a complete vision of her as if she were in the room. Now I don't know if that had anything to do with what happened next, but I had a flash, I came to the realization that I was responsible for my whole life, whatever had happened. I used to blame my family, society, my wife . . . and that day I saw so clearly that I had nobody to blame but myself. I put everything on my shoulders and I felt so relieved: Now I'm free, no one else is responsible.

In sum, where the others were, where 'hell is other people', I comes to be.

Two other weighty endorsements are foregrounded in the theosophical literature. Gandhi had met Madame Blavatsky in London, where some theosophists had shown him the Bhagavad Gita (which he had never read), and he maintained that the teaching of this Russian-American, née von Hahn, was 'Hinduism at its best'. Meanwhile, in the 1960s, a certain someone purportedly presented herself at the international headquarters of the Theosophical Society in Adyar, wanting absolutely to pay a visit to the site, given that a copy of The Secret Doctrine used to hold pride of place on the desk of her late uncle, Albert Einstein.

Two questions are of special interest to the reader of The Sinthome. First, what is this manvantara? Second, how is it that the name Blavatsky and the word manvantara come to be on Lacan's lips on page 105?

It is certainly no easy matter for the uninitiated to answer the first question. Nevertheless, by condensing and simplifying a great deal the sometimes incoherent data that I gathered from several sources, I have developed the following exposé, without being able to guarantee whether it is perfectly orthodox, and without myself having penetrated its meaning which in all likelihood is esoteric.

We should start off from the fundamental postulate of theosophy: the universe, an uncreated reality that constitutes a unique Whole, contains within it the potentiality of every manifested form, and this is why one can call it the unmanifested. Periodically it does manifest itself as an objective universe. The periods of manifestation (manvantara) and unmanifestation, or dissolution (Pralaya), alternate over both a long and a short duration. A Life of Brahma (also known as maha-manvantara, or universal manvantara, which is not to be confused with the manvantara to which Lacan is very likely referring) is followed by a Dissolution of Brahma (or maha-pralaya) of equal duration. The Day (or Kalpa) of Brahma, when there is a manifestation, is followed by a Night of Brahma, a dissolution of equal length, before a new awakening of Brahma comes to pass. If one is curious to know the durations in question, one just has to refer to the Srimad-Bhagavatam: one Life of Brahma lasts 100 Divine Years, that is, 311, 040, 000, 000, 000 human years; each of the Divine Years contains 360 Days and 360 Nights, that is, 4, 320, 000, 000 human years per Divine Day. Each Divine Day comprises fourteen periods. At the start of each period, there is an apparition of a Manu (yes indeed, the Manu of the Law Code of Manu), the generic name of the One and Only Sovereign whose mission is to govern the whole of the terrestrial world during this period, which bears his name.

This is where we are. This period, which lies between (antara) two Manus, is called manvantara, or Age of the World. At present, on this Day of four million-odd years in which we find ourselves, six manvantaras have already passed. We are living, therefore, in the seventh manvantara, whose Manu, we will be pleased to learn, is Vaivasvata, son of the Sun-God.

Blavatskian theosophy ensures that each spirit passes through the manvantara, that is to say, through manifestation for one's own enrichment and for that of the Whole. Through a 'process of gradual evolution', the Sages, the mahatmas and rishis, who have appeared in the course of a manvantara, naturally become, after its expiration, planetary spirits who guide the evolution of future planets. One and all are invited to profit from this knowledge in everyday life, preferably under the guidance of a confirmed Master.

This is certainly not impossible: Miller's testimony, if it is acknowledged, shows that this path, which might seem extraordinary or even extravagant, is nevertheless able to minimize one's minor ills, right there on the spot, for who would put anything off until Tomorrow when the Day and the Night last four million years? Or rather, it is precisely because this path is so out-of-the-ordinary that it is not implausible that it might enable a subject to obtain, at least fleetingly, a point of access to the effect of banalization that Freud (but not Lacan) readily understood as the result to be expected from an analysis (this is a personal commentary).

Second question: what is this astonishing Blavatskian blather doing in The Sinthome?

It was certainly summoned up by Joyce's taste for theosophical speculation, but not only that. Indeed, in his youth, Lacan was in contact with the major French initiate René Guénon, so much so that the scattered references to initiation in his teaching, as caustic as they most often are, nevertheless bear out the traces left by his former curiosity, and are absolutely first-hand (if I may say so, since in this context nothing is ever really first-hand). These references in Lacan bring out all the better the recent and, as it were, miraculous character of the advent of scientific discourse. On Guénon, see for example: Bruno Hapel, René Guénon et le Roi du monde, Guy Trédaniel, 2001. Moreover, it is noteworthy that Guénon held Mme Blavatsky's doctrine to be hare-brained, and brushed aside psychoanalysis for being downright diabolical.

The eroticism that has always been attached to the unveiling of the world's mystery shows that it is expedient to distinguish, as does Lacan, between the symbol of the symbolic phallus, labelled uppercase Φ, to be read capital Phi (which is not to be confused with φ, small phi, the imaginary phallus), and the signifier of the barred Other, S(Ⱥ), which designates, among other things, the nonsensical place of the last truth (see pp. 107–8 of The Sinthome; the passage to which he is alluding can be found on pp. 28–9 of Encore).

§ 14. Derrida and the knot

In tribute to the memory of the philosopher who was one of the mentors of my youth, I shall develop further the detail conjured up by the mention of Derrida's name on p. 124. [14]

Lacan judged that Derrida had neglected to acknowledge what the invention of 'grammatology' and archi-écriture owed to the circulation of terms that came from his teaching ('La psychanalyse. Raison d'un échec', December 1967, in Autres écrits, p. 346), and that this invention was itself an academic counterfeit of this teaching, a 'confusional discourse' ('Lituraterre', in Hurly-Burly, 9, p. 32, where the name of Derrida, who is clearly being fingered, does not appear), while sometimes recognizing, at least allusively, that the topicality of the question of writing in the intellectual and literary context of the time was largely due to Derrida's early articles, collected in Writing and Difference (London: Routledge, 1978).

On Derrida's side, in a now famous article from 1975 ('Le facteur de la vérité', translated as 'The Purveyor of Truth' in Yale French Studies, 52, pp. 31–113, and retranslated with its original French title in The Post Card, University of Chicago Press, 1987, pp. 411–96), he indulges in a painstaking re-reading of the 1956 'Seminar on "The Purloined Letter"' (Écrits, pp. 11–61) and Poe's tale, under the cover of which he levels fundamental objections at Lacan's doctrine of the letter and 'logic of the signifier'.

The historical importance of this critique cannot be overestimated. For the followers of deconstruction, it had the effect of making Lacan seem 'old-hat'. For the Lacanians, they turned away from reading Derrida, even though many of them had followed his elaborations with great sympathy at the start. By my reckoning, however, the debt that I had acquired with respect to the man who throughout my years at the École normale had been my professor, my mentor, my friend, and even my confidant (as the so-called caïmans of the ENS often are), forbade me from entering into this controversy by supporting Lacan's colours against his, just as I deemed that I did not share Lacan's declared contempt for Derrida (see for example the passage cited above from 'La psychanalyse. Raison d'un échec'). While I felt free to evoke this theme occasionally in my courses at the Department of Psychoanalysis, I abstained from giving any commentary beyond those confines.

It was with this in mind that, in January 1987, during a round-table discussion at the Collège international de philosophie to which Derrida and Jean-Pierre Vernant had been invited to comment on the release of the second volume of Élisabeth Roudinesco's Histoire de la psychanalyse en France (she was present in the audience), I declined the sudden urging from the chairman of the panel, René Major, to respond to the objections raised in 'Le facteur de la vérité'. It was in this same spirit that, when I was publishing extracts from Seminar XXIII[15] in the journal Ornicar ?, I withheld the passage where Lacan treats Derrida harshly for his Preface to The Wolf Man's Magic Word: A Cryptonomy by Nicolas Abraham and Maria Torok. It nevertheless transpired that Derrida took me to task for this omission ('For the Love of Lacan', lecture delivered at the colloquium 'Lacan avec des philosophes' in May 1992, published in the Journal of European Psychoanalysis, 2, 1995/1996, pp. 63–90; reprinted in Jacques Derrida, Resistances of Psychoanalysis, Stanford University Press, 1998, pp. 39–69). The misunderstanding seemed to me to be irreversible, and over-determined to such a degree that explaining myself to him could only amplify it.

What was Derrida's central objection? For him, Lacan's letter is 'intangible and indestructible', an 'indivisible locality' (p. 425 of The Post Card). Lacan purportedly assigns to the letter 'a proper, and properly circular, itinerary', and this would be attested by the final sentence of his text: 'So it is that what is meant by "the purloined letter", or even en souffrance, is that a letter arrives always at its destination.' Now, Derrida maintains that if the letter is indestructible then in fact it is being elevated to the 'ideality of a meaning' (p. 466), and if it comes back after each detour from its proper trajectory (or 'itinerary'), it is because this is actually 'transcendental reappropriation and readequation'. All in all, in Lacan, 'the signifier must never risk being lost, destroyed, divided, or fragmented without return' (p. 438). Against this 'law of the signifier', Derrida victoriously proffers 'dissemination' and 'disseminating power': 'a letter can always not arrive at its destination', its 'partition' is 'always possible', 'it can always be fragmented without return', and so on (p. 438 and p. 465).

The most straightforward reply to Derrida's objection forced itself upon me as soon as I read his 1975 article. It is not accurate that the letter as such in Lacan is intangible, indestructible, indivisible, or ideal. The memorable episodes of the letter's destruction, from the fire in the Library of Alexandria to Kafka's instructions to Max Brod, and simple good sense as well, make it highly improbable that Lacan had maintained such a conception. But more than that, there is a text.

Just a year and a half after writing the 'Seminar on "The Purloined Letter"', which was completed in August 1956 (Écrits, p. 41), Lacan wrote an article that was supposed to be published in the April 1958 issue of the journal Critique under the title 'The youth of Gide or the letter and desire' (later included in the Écrits, pp. 759–64). The last six pages are devoted to an admirable analysis of 'Madeleine's act' of burning the near-totality of letters she had received from André no sooner had she learnt of his departure for England with his young lover, Marc Allégret.

Lacan recognizes in the act of burning these letters the same act that Medea commits. Indeed, at the same time as she sacrifices 'what is most precious to her', as she puts it, she also wrests it from Gide, who wept over the letters, 'his child', 'the best of me'. He would wait for Madeleine's death before penning his testimony of this event, under the Virgilian title Et nunc manet in te (published in 1947, included in the Journal 1939–1949). It was only then that he yielded the pages of his Journal dedicated to the episode, which he had cut out of the previous volume.

Lacan stresses the fact that these letters had no copies, which according to him attests to 'their nature as a fetish'. He sees them as comparable to what Molière's character Harpagon hides in his cash box, the object that is brought into function in desire, which Lacan would later designate as 'the cause of desire' (the expression features already in 'The signification of the phallus', Écrits, p. 691, dated May 1958, but it would only be properly grounded in the 1962–1963 Seminar Anxiety; thereafter it can be found in several of Lacan's seminars and writings). Even though the word is never uttered, Lacan undoubtedly recognizes in Gide's letters the status of the object a.

But there is no need to venture into such arcana to affirm, on the basis of this text, that it is inaccurate to allege that Lacan failed to recognize the letter's tangible, destructible, and divisible character, which is not ideal but very material. On the other hand, it is hard to explain how such a pernickety reader as Derrida, who was so anxious about the sources of his information, so lavish in his quotations, who didn't hesitate to scour the volume of the Écrits to show how it was entirely steeped in the erroneous doctrine he detected in the 'Seminar on "The Purloined Letter"' (he refers to no less than fourteen texts in the collection, if our count is correct; nor does he neglect the 'later publications', two of which are cited) should have skipped over what is spread out across six pages of 'The youth of Gide'. This omission is all the more surprising given that this text features among the fourteen I counted, two pages of which, p. 742 and p. 753, are quoted on pp. 467–8 of The Post Card in regard to the function of fiction in literature, but without the faintest mention of the title of the article from which the quotations are lifted.

These six pages of the Écrits thus stand as 'the purloined letter', or the blunder of the 'Purveyor of truth'. A first blunder since, when 'Le facteur de la vérité' came out, 'Lituraterre' had already been published four years hence, and this text contained everything it should have taken to hold the philosopher's attention.

Indeed, it was first published as the leading article of issue 3 of the journal Littérature (Larousse, 1971, pp. 3–10), which also included (on pp. 79–85, with an introduction by Catherine Clément) the note on Dora that Lacan mentions on p. 87 of The Sinthome, and whose author was a friend they had in common, herself a Joycean, Hélène Cixous (detail: her play, Le Portrait de Dora, was published in 1978 by Éditions des Femmes).

Furthermore, back in his earliest published essay (I can still see him in the bookshop of Presses universitaires, flicking through the first copies of his book), Derrida had ascribed to Joyce and his attempt to 'repeat [. . .] all equivocation', the place of an 'other pole' with respect to the Husserlian attempt to obtain a univocal and transparent language. This was a veritable 'choice' (the word is out) on the side of heresy. These days we can scarcely imagine just how incongruous this orientation was in the philosophical context of the time, and this played no small part in the fact that among all the teachers back then at the Sorbonne, I chose the young Derrida to become his student (See Edmund Husserl's 'Origin of Geometry': An Introduction, Lincoln: University of Nebraska Press, 1978, this fine page falls on p. 102 of the John P. Leavey translation).

I would feel bad were these lines to revive the Picrocholin wars between Lacanians and Derridians when the present situation, which is characterized by the resurgence of orthodoxies, could on the contrary lead their students to renew their alliances of old. Lacan and Derrida are each major figures in their respective genres, it is simply a matter of knowing what those genres are. After all, Lacan began, as he reminds us in The Sinthome (p. 63), with 'Écrits "inspirés": schizographie'. Perhaps everything is to be found there (this article was presented, having been drafted along with two co-authors, in the Annales médico-psychologiques, 1931, tome II, pp. 508–22; it is set to be included in a volume currently being prepared in the 'Champ freudien' collection).

There is certainly much to be said to clarify Derrida in contrast to Lacan, and vice-versa. One could of course defend much further the pertinence of the perspective chosen in 'Le facteur de la vérité', but I would prefer to count on the many practitioners of deconstruction for that, this text having pushed me away from an oeuvre whose progress I had followed up to that point.

What I do know is that the knots in The Sinthome are a form of writing, and the knot is a letter. Moreover, Lacan reckoned he had inaugurated 'this business of writing' (p. 125) through the role he had been giving, from his Seminar IX onwards, to the 'unary trait' (which is how he translates Freud's einziger Zug from the last line of the fifth paragraph in chapter VII of Massenpsychologie; see for example Seminar XI, p. 256).

§ 14. The enigma of enunciation

Intension, with an 's', p. 132: Lacan had already employed the distinction between intension and extension (see for example the 'Proposition of 9 October on the Psychoanalyst of the School' in Analysis, 6, 1995, p. 6).

The distinction is recognized in logic: the extension of a class is the objects that it contains, its denotation; the intension is the definition of these objects, the property (or properties) or attribute(s) that allow(s) them to be selected in a universe (of discourse).

Intension can be purely subjective, varying according to different individuals. It can also be objective and designate all the attributes, whether known or unknown, that the denoted objects have in common; intension is then equivalent to comprehension. Lastly, if it concerns only those attributes selected by convention, then intension is equivalent to connotation. This latter aspect is the one that concerns logic. One can find this useful three-phase division in the old primer by Cohen and Nagel, An Introduction to Logic and Scientific Method, Routledge, 1934, reprinted in 1963, pp. 30–3. This is where the difficulties begin.

Quine found intension deeply repellent because of the so-called 'referential opacity' phenomena to which it gives rise, notably in quotation, and because of the appearance of 'truth-value gaps' that complicate deduction. Thus, the penultimate chapter of Word and Object (MIT Press, 1960) carries the title 'Flight from Intension'. Quine endorses and methodically organizes this flight from Egypt by banning all 'intensional objects' in accordance with the principle, worthy of Antiochus Epiphanes, that 'explication is elimination' (p. 260). It is true that language amounts to much ado about nothing, but forcing oneself to speak only and always about what exists results in a perfectly transparent and regimented discourse that is shorn of proper names (in order to avoid the occurrence of unicorns and other creatures such as might be found in a Blavatsky- or Meinong-style discourse), that is shorn of meanings and surprises, a discourse in which we always know in advance who is who and who does what.

The Quinean universe, with its detached and ironic Olympian calm, a little dull but exceedingly worthy, and really rather nice once the extermination of intruders has been taken care of, in which there reigns a principle of caution and least effort that has been pushed to its extreme, and whose Stimmung is not far removed from the one that makes itself felt in the logician's autobiography (see above § 9), did not survive Rorty's betrayal, infected though it was with the most muddled intensional abstractions of 'French Theory', deconstruction, and even Heidegger (who had nevertheless been pilloried by Carnap). Nor above all did it survive the assault from Kripke, which was hailed by Lacan no sooner than his lectures were collected in the 1972 volume that bears the title Naming and Necessity. We shall mention once again that the translator of this book (published in French by Éditions de Minuit) was a contributor to Lacan's Seminar (François Recanati).

A little further down, on p. 133, Lacan indicates that he once turned his interest to the enigma of the riddle. A passage from The Other Side of Psychoanalysis (p. 36–7)[16] effectively defines enigma in reference to enunciation, in contradistinction to quotation which is defined in reference to the statement. The enigma is an enunciation that defers to the listener in order to become a statement; the quotation is a statement that settles the enigma of enunciation by means of the author's proper name.

This pairing is highly instructive. For example, it affords an immediate understanding of why it was quite normal that it should be the co-author of the Vocabulary of Psychoanalysis, a very orderly compilation of quotes from Freud, who questioned Lacan on the truth of truth (see here, p. 132)[17].

Saying the truth about truth presupposes eliminating the enunciation in favour of the statement (of an operating predicate 'x is true'). Yet, this 'true', which is the 'intensional truth' from page 132, remains relative to the universe of discourse that is under consideration, to its axioms and procedures of validation. It just requires a harmonious accord of signifiers among themselves. The signifier, like the jackass, rubs itself against the signifier, it deploys its networks, meanders and labyrinths, but all this is tantamount to turning round in circles in the ring of the symbolic, around an invisible hole, that of the want-of-saying. This is the Quinean path, which is not bereft of wisdom.

On the other hand there is the paradoxical necessity, as in The Sinthome, of inventing and naming the 'bare' real, which is set apart from the true, which ex-sists relative to the 'symbolic order', and which is lawless, disconnected, and haphazard.

This is a new and extreme variation of Lacan's perennial formula: truth possesses the structure of fiction; it is fantasmatic through and through, it is mendacious, or rather mensonge, the songe qui ment, the dream that tells lies; it is semblance; it stands betwixt us and the real (see The Other Side of Psychoanalysis, p. 174).

Footnotes are one of the ordinary incarnations of the 'truth about truth'. Whether from the author or his commentator, whether at the foot of the page or carried over to the end of the book, the footnote stands in the position of meta-language, from which it effects a semblance of validation (or invalidation) with respect to the object-language. One has only to savour Anthony Grafton's lesson in his spicy little book The Footnote: A Curious History, Faber, 1997, to grasp the deep-lying reasons that led Lacan to decide to rule out this way of going about things for the published edition of his Seminar, where what is at stake is to make an enunciation pass through into writing without dulling its enigmatic radiance.

It will be remarked that in this 'Note' I have replaced tragedy[18] with facetiae, and you shall be the judge of whether I have displayed the enigma of enunciation, in its loquacity as much as its arbitrariness and mystery.

§ 17. The Unerkannt

The adjective unerkannt on p. 129, which translates as 'unrecognized', 'unacknowledged', or 'unidentified', features as a noun in a famous sentence from chapter seven of The Interpretation of Dreams, dedicated to 'The psychology of the dream processes' (Gesammelte Schriften, Internationaler Psychoanalytischer Verlag, 1925, Tome II, p. 466; The Interpretation of Dreams in the Standard Edition 5, Hogarth, 1953, p. 525). Freud notes the persistence of 'eine Stelle im Dunkel' (an obscure point) in the most thoroughly interpreted dreams, and he adds: 'Dies ist dann der Nabel des Traumes [the dream's navel], die Stelle, an der er dem Unerkannten aufsitzt [the spot where it reaches down into the unknown].'

There has been a great deal of lucubration around this so-called 'unknown'. When asked about it in January 1975, Lacan translates unerkannt as 'unacknowledged'. He identifies it with what Freud calls the Urverdrängt, the primary or primordially repressed (cf. especially the 1915 articles on repression and the unconscious, as well as Inhibitions, Symptoms and Anxiety, chapter X, Standard Edition 20, Hogarth, 1959, p. 94) which he reads as a knot in the utterable comparable to the hole in the drive (see Seminar XI). On this topic, he developed some highly original considerations (his remarks, which in their time were published in the Lettres of the École freudienne de Paris, are due to appear, in a version established by my hand, in a volume in the 'Paradoxes' series[19]). Freud notes in the same passage that the dream-thoughts branch out in every direction, like the networks of the Project for a Scientific Psychology that are involved on page 112 (translated into English in Origins of Psychoanalysis, Basic Books, 1954, pp. 347–445, reprinted in the Standard Edition 1, Hogarth, 1966, pp. 283–397; the networks Lacan is speaking about are represented on page 354; see also pp. 313, 314, 324 and 341). One keeps on finding, and yet one keeps on searching. Finding is not the opposite of searching. The find does not put an end to the search, but endlessly starts it over again.

The same goes for the remarks that make up this 'Note threaded stitch by stitch'.

§ 18. Folisophy

Lacan once adopted for himself Picasso's superb statement, 'I do not seek, I find' (p. 74; see Seminar XI, p. 7). I am the author of the rather uncharitable (private) remark alluded to on p. 74: 'These days, you might as well say: I don't find, I seek.' In the same spirit, see p. 106.

What was he seeking? Well, a knot from which he could fashion the privileged support of his lucubrations, and which would start them over again by questioning him, as we saw him doing with the non-permutative rotation of the four well-chosen symbols from which he would draw his 'four discourses'.

He sought an aid of the same sort in Joyce. Unlike Joyce, however, he did not dream of calling upon the father (the last sentence of A Portrait, quoted on p. 55).

If the knot as the subject's support holds together, then there is no need of the Name-of-the-Father: it is superfluous. If the knot does not hold together, the Name holds the function of the sinthome. In psychoanalysis, it is an instrument for transforming jouissance by way of meaning. It works in the same way as the Name that transforms the x of the mother's desire (DM) in the 'paternal metaphor' by giving it the signification of the phallus (Écrits, p. 557).

One can, therefore, make use of the Name-of-the-Father while still dispensing with any belief in it (see above, p. 116). This sentence has provided the theme of the next Congress of the World Association of Psychoanalysis, which will be held in Rome in 2006. The reference to Totem and Taboo on p. 130 is a cursory reminder of the thesis that was set out and developed at length in the second part of The Other Side of Psychoanalysis, pp. 85–140, under the title 'Beyond the Oedipus Complex'. Lacan calls upon this beyond (which is ipso facto a beyond of the Name-of-the-Father and a beyond of La femme, the latter being a version of the Father according to Autres écrits, p. 563)[20] in order to restore to female sexuality its own specific structure, which Freud had unduly restricted to male coordinates (see 'L'étourdit' in Autres écrits, especially p. 462, passim).

Yet all the help in the world could never silence the tolling bell of the 'hopelessness' that resounds throughout The Sinthome like a 'Nevermore'. It is the hopelessness of the 'method' of the knots (p. 25); the hopelessness of any relation between the sexes.

Lacan had commented on Plato's Symposium in his Seminar on Transference, the sixth chapter of which was dedicated to Aristophanes' myth; he later offered a less optimistic and somewhat fantastic version, worthy of Edgar Allan Poe, in what is known as the 'lamella myth', mentioned on pp. 29–30 (see Écrits, pp. 845–7). In this lamella one can recognize the entity that Freud conjured up in his 1915 article 'Trieb und Triebschicksal' (commented on in Seminar XI, chapters XIII and XIV; see also Écrits, pp. 851–4): 'eines fast völlig hilflosen, in der Welt noch unorientierten Lebewesens, welches Reize in seiner Nervensubstanz auffängt', an almost entirely helpless organism, as yet unoriented in the world, whose nerve substance receives stimuli (Gesammelte Werke, Tome 10, p. 212: see also James Strachey's footnote on p. 119 of the Standard Edition 14). Lacan turns this into the representation of libido. It would be a third, supplementary, entity that arises from the break of the initial egg. This is an image of the object a, an object that itself translates the constant character of the Freudian drive, its 'konstante Kraft'.

The approach to energetics by way of a numerical constant to be obtained in a closed universe is pointed out on pp. 113–14 of The Sinthome. This theme made its appearance in Lacan's teaching during Seminar XII, in reference to The Feynman Lectures on Physics (see also Richard P. Feynman, The Character of Physical Law, BBC, 1965). It is also mentioned in 'Television', pp. 24–5.

In The Sinthome, Lacan underlines the 'helpmeet against', the ezer k'negdo (see § 1), the one that God created for man by giving him a woman. The word k'negdo has not failed to mobilize the ingenuity of exegetes. Its roots are K, 'as', and NGD, 'which is contrary to', 'in front of', 'opposite', 'in the presence of', and 'spouse'. In verses 18 and 20, the D is written with a dot, which gives it the sense of 'opposed', 'contrary'. The literal translation would be: 'as a presence of that which is against.'

In the English translation of the Aggadah from the Babylonian Talmud (compiled in Salonica c. 1515) we read:

> R. Eleazar also said: 'What is the meaning of the scriptural text: I will make an ezer kenegdo? If he is worth it, she is his helper, and if he is not worth it, she is against him.
>
> [. . .] It is written [as though it could be read] kenagdo (opposing him) but we read kenegdo (corresponding to him): when he is worth it, she is a counterpart for him, but when he is not, she chastises him (menagado).[21]

The Midrash Rabba, which was compiled in the fifth century, states that the kenegdo shall be a helper if he merits it, 'otherwise – against him' (17.3[22]). The Pirke de-Rabbi Eliezer, midrashic commentaries that were composed c. 830 and which gave a decisive push to the shaping of Kabbalah, in particular the composition of the Zohar, sets down the following: 'Rabbi Jehudah said: – If he be worthy she shall be an help meet [kenegdo] for him; if not, she shall be against him [lenagdo] to fight him.'[23] The word lenagdo is constructed of L, meaning 'towards', with a movement, and NGD, meaning 'against'. Finally, we have the Zohar:

> This helpmeet against him is the Mishnah, [. . .] the maidservant of the Shekhinah. If Israel [i.e. the man] so merits, the Mishnah will be a helpmeet in his exile, functioning on the side of the permissible, the pure, and the kosher. If not, the Mishnah will be against him, functioning on the side of the impure, the improper, and the forbidden. (Tikunei haZohar, 27b)

The Mishnah is literally 'the Repetition', or 'the Second'; written between the first and second centuries it constitutes the base of the legislative teaching of Judaism.

Antoine Fabre d'Olivet translated the verse literally: 'Je ferai à lui une force auxiliaire (un soutien, une aide, une corroboration, une doublure) en reflet lumineux de lui.'[24] As much as Blavatsky, or even Anne-Catherine Emmerich ('the pious nun', a stigmatist who delighted Clemens Brentano), as much as the marquis de Saint-Yves d'Alveydre, who 'possessed the faculty of being able to duplicate himself and project into the astral realm' and who became guru to René Guénon, as much as Ferdynand Antoni Ossendowski, the author of Beasts, Men and Gods (1922), and just as much as the whole Swedenborgian procession of the last centuries, this great Kabbalist initiate deserves wider renown; see issue 138 of the Revue d'études d'Oc, June 2004, devoted to 'Fabre d'Olivet, Occitanist, Hebraist, and theosophist', under the aegis of the Centre d'enseignement et de recherche d'oc, Paris-Sorbonne University. Les Secrets kabbalistiques de la Bible, Licorne ailée, from the hand of François Brousse, the eminent and prolific neo-surrealist poet-theosophist (b. Perpignan 1913; d. Clamart 1995) also makes for profitable reading.

Are there such secrets to be found in The Sinthome? One could plausibly maintain that there are. For example, who would believe that it is really by chance that Sollers in the late 1970s, that is, precisely during Lacan's last years, wrote his Paradis (published in 1981, the very year of the master's death)? When one knows that the word comes from Paradêsha, 'the supreme region' in Sanskrit, one cannot help but wonder to what extent the Seminar, under the reassuring appearance of a rational exploration of the properties of knots for psychoanalytic purposes, might actually have been the spiritual centre (though only for certain initiates since it is invisible to common folk) that is described in tradition under the name of Agartha, the Paradise of the present esoteric cycle? To go straight to the heart of the matter, doesn't Sollers let us hear, in his exceedingly singular 'novel', that he recognized in the person of the 'doctor' Lacan none other than Melchizedek, or rather, Malki Tzedek?

The question is there for the posing. That it should be greeted with a chuckle to which the interested parties are well accustomed, and that Lacan like Freud should have flatly rejected any compromise with occultism, ought not to be confused by anyone with a serious refutation. 'Since it's slower [to read], paradoxically, it gets ahead of itself', explains Sollers of Paradis. This paradox, with its indisputably Kabbalistic scent, is also the paradox of The Sinthome in which the 'power of unreading' that Lacan prided himself on is pushed to its limits.

Let's come back to the aforementioned hopelessness. It also makes itself heard in Lacan's gloomy reply to the question about China on p. 118: 'I've been waiting, but I don't hope for anything.' In his 1968–1969 Seminar, Lacan hypothesized that Chairman Mao was aiming to reconfigure the relationships between the subject and knowledge (which would have allowed the field of 'creative subjectivity' to open up to the working class, along with the poor and the medium-poor peasants; see above, § 3). But Lacan added that we would have 'to wait in order to see more clearly'. In 1976, it was still a matter of waiting, but this time without hope. Already in 1972, in a private admonition to his then militantly Maoist son-in-law, Lacan was maintaining that money reigned supreme in Peking (see François Regnault, 'I was struck by what you said . . .', Hurly-Burly 6, 2011, pp. 23–8).

This absence of hope (see also 'Television', pp. 42–4) is not despair. It opens the path to wisdom. But which wisdom?

On no account is it that of the Book of Wisdom (cited on pp. 108–9). Among the Sapiential Books in the third part of the Bible, Lacan singles out this one for how it grounds wisdom on lack. This point is especially tangible in the first part of the Book, which lists the ills with which the righteous may be afflicted without losing their quality of righteousness.

No, the wisdom of the sinthome is not resignation to lack, nor is it the return to zero or the homeostasis of the stable existence of the universal under the ferule of the pleasure-principle. The wisdom of the sinthome is neither the Wisdom of Solomon, nor Hegel, nor Husserl, nor Quine, but much rather Joyce, as the young Derrida had spotted so well.

Joycean wisdom is much rather a 'folisophy' (p. 108). It consists in making use of one's sinthome, the singularity of one's supposed 'psychical handicap', for better or worse, without crushing its relief under common sense.

Even when it falls under the remit of mereotopology (Nicholas Asher and Laure Vieu, 'Toward a Geometry of Common Sense: A Semantics and a Complete Axiomatization of Mereotopology' in C. Mellish (ed.), Proceedings of the 14th IJCAI. San Mateo, Morgan Kaufmann, 1995, pp. 846–52), common sense remains fundamentally Scottish. As for sinthomal wisdom, it is of Irish stock. Nothing could be further from the French ideological school, for which Lacan harboured a deep and constant aversion (hence our allusion to Victor Cousin in § 5). This aversion has, moreover, often been mutual.

Ideology (see the fine study by François Picavet, Les Idéologues. Essai sur l'histoire des idées et des théories scientifiques, philosophiques, religieuses, etc., en France depuis 1789, Paris, 1891) still permeates in this day and age what the French like to think of as their esprit cartésien, which is actually far removed from the spirit of the adventurous cavalier that Descartes was. In the progeny of Ideology, which is altogether forgotten nowadays in keeping with its omnipresence in the intellectual life of the nation, we also meet as much the École polytechnique students, at least those of the nineteenth century, who 'prided themselves on having more precise and more satisfactory solutions than anyone else for all political, religious and social questions' (Émile Keller), and who 'ventured to create a religion as one learns at the École to build a bridge or a road' (Albert Thibaudet; these two quotes come from chapter 11 of F. A. Hayek, The Counter-Revolution of Science: Studies on the Abuse of Reason, Liberty Fund, 1952, reprinted in 1979; the author stresses disapprovingly their 'propensity to become socialists', p. 113), as the ironic liberal partisans of Ernest Renan, whose brightest prospects in humanism and literature are Messrs Marc Fumaroli and François Sureau.

§ 19. Hogarth

The ethic sketched out in The Sinthome is complemented by an aesthetic.

The aged Lacan's inspired speculations and sometimes exceedingly laboured 'diffuse bleed' (he was the first to say so), his breaches through the dark obscurity and his serpentine knots which for him were both torture and delight, emit a strange effect of beauty.

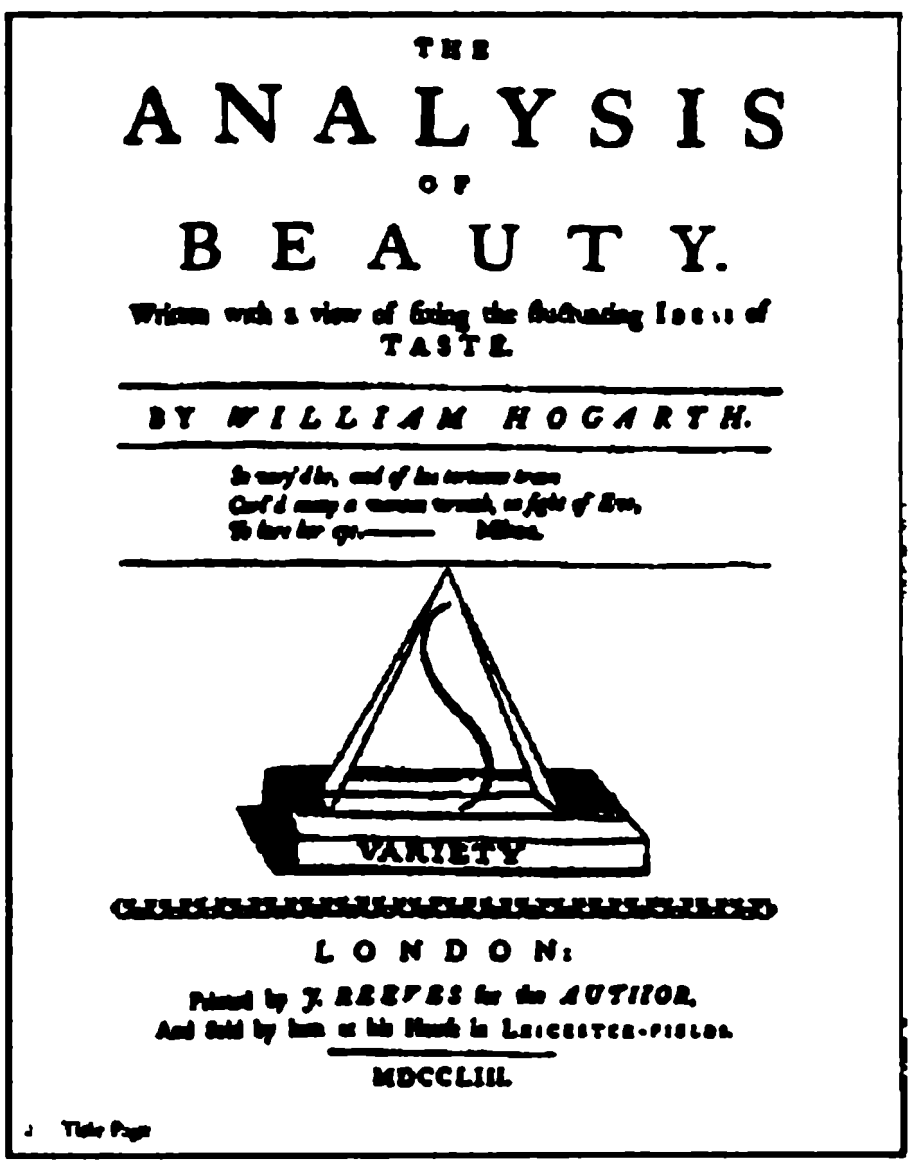
This is not peaceful Fibonaccian beauty in the pattern of the golden section, designed to accord with stable existence in the universal; it is the winding, varied, and haphazard beauty that Hogarth's genius depicted in a single undulating ethereal line (see p. 54). Himself something of a Popillius here, Hogarth encloses it not in a circle this time, but in a translucent pyramid.



§ 20. Envoi

O Lacan, now that thou art no more than the name of thy Luciferian desire – in the proper sense: he who shines light in the darkness – this faithful Achates, who carries upon his back the weight of this light, calls on thy glorious shadow to bear witness:

'I can say that yes, I am content, content at having endued thy voice with the written form most worthy of bearing it, content at having brightened thy sombre dissonant symphony with a hundredfold blithesome arias, content to have done so while delivering to the common folk nothing of the unsullied arcana of thy lettre voilée.'

§ 21. 'A commodius vicus of recirculation'

Leaning on Jacques-Alain, his staff beyond the grave, the Doctor stands upright, in keeping with the erstwhile wish of their dear

Back to the start

Nota bene

The Écrits have been referenced in the 1966 French edition, and the Autres écrits in the 2001 edition; both were published by Seuil, who have also published all the Seminars edited to date; the Seminars yet to appear have been referenced in the text as currently in preparation.

Philippe Sollers has kindly agreed for Navarin to reprint his interview quoted in § 1 in a short book that will bear the title Lacan même, which is slated to come out at the same time as The Sinthome (distribution by Seuil); the historian Dominique Colas, author of the classic Le Léninisme. Philosophie et sociologie politique du léninisme (PUF, 1982 and 1998), contacted by my brother Gérard, located the Lenin quotes in § 5 for me; the mathematician M* S* proofed § 11, and informed me of Perko's remarkable discovery; the historian Élisabeth Roudinesco, whose works form part of the essential references of the period, provided me with the dates and titles I needed for the fifth paragraph of § 15; the psychiatrist Yves-Claude Stavy shared with me his knowledge on the 'helpmeet k'negdo' (§ 18); an additional reference was furnished by the Israeli psychoanalyst Marco Mauas; I have been surrounded by the abiding friendship of my colleagues from the École de la Cause freudienne and the World Association of Psychoanalysis, who have helped me more than I can say.

I would like to express my gratitude for the aid they have been kind enough to offer me, and I thank 'in advance any reader who would like to collaborate in the revision of a text that is the object of continuing work. Comments should be forwarded c/o my publisher' (quoted from the 'Acknowledgements' to The Ethics of Psychoanalysis, 1992, p. 326).

Please pardon the author's faults. As Joyce said for a long while of Finnegans Wake: 'work in progress'.

Post-scriptum

Hardly had I finished correcting the text of the present 'Note' than someone pointed out to me, in this week's edition of the magazine Voici (No. 898, 24–30 January 2005, pp. 44–5), an interview with Philippe Sollers under the title 'Oui, je suis Dieu!'

Actually, those words come from the lips of the journalists: 'They say that you're God in the world of literature!' to which Sollers gives an ok-you're-on reply, 'well, my children, yes, I'm God!' The mere existence of this humorous exchange confirms, if need be, my argument in § 12.

I shall add, following the same register of ideas, that to offer to the public some notion that approximated the figure of the psychoanalyst, Lacan drew on saintliness, and not on the unique God ('Television', pp. 15–16), since The Analyst has no more existence than La femme (see § 4, and Autres écrits, p. 308: 'the analyst falls under the remit of the not-all').

If the analyst is a saint, the question could then be posed as to whether the unconscious might not be God (see the highly informed book by François Regnault, Dieu est inconscient, Navarin, 1986). In any case, one can be quite sure that if He were, he would be unable, contrary to Sollers, to affirm: 'Yes, I am.'

He would not even know that He exists.

27 January 2005

Notes

All notes below have been provided by the translator.

Chapter I. On the Logical Use of the Sinthome, or Freud with Joyce

1 The four planar diagrams depict four different projections of the same knot: the 'three-twist knot' (Rolfsen notation 5_2).
2 Here and hereafter, we use lalingua for lalangue. Lalangue is a contraction of la langue ('the tongue' or 'the language') and is reminiscent of 'lallation' (as Lacan himself remarks; cf. (1989) 'Geneva lecture on the symptom', Analysis 1:14).
3 L'élangues is homophonic with les langues. Sollers's neologism is evocative of the verb élanguer, 'to remove the tongue', and also élan ('momentum', 'impetus', 'surge' or 'urge').
4 L'Èvie is homophonic with les vies, 'lives'.
5 This sentence contains some extended wordplay: Lacan's term parlêtre condenses être parlé, 'spoken being', and par lettre, 'by letter'; le serre-fesses is derived from serrer les fesses, literally 'to clench the buttocks', which carries the idiomatic sense of 'to brace oneself'; and lastly faut-pas, 'ought not', is homophonic with 'faux pas'.
6 Ce qu'on dit ment, 'what one says lies', is homophonic with ce condiment.
7 Throughout the first three lessons of this Seminar, Lacan often uses the terms nœud and nœud borroméen imprecisely, referring to links of three or four components. From the fourth lesson onwards, he rectifies his vocabulary, switching to chaîne and chaîne borroméenne, while reserving the term nœud (with some exceptions) for single-component knots. See also Chapter II note 1 below.
8 L6a4 (Rolfsen notation 6^3_2).
9 The figure on the left is equivalent to Rolfsen notation 0^3_1; the figure on the right is a four-component Brunnian link with a crossing number of 14.
10 This doubling of the components is conventionally known as Bing doubling (after R. H. Bing).
11 Further figurations of L6a4, though not in minimal projection.

Chapter II. On What Makes a Hole in the Real

1 It should be noted that what Lacan calls 'the Borromean property' corresponds more conventionally to 'the Brunnian property'. Here and hereafter, when Lacan speaks of a link tied 'in Borromean fashion', it equates with the criterion of a Brunnian link, which holds that both the minimum cutting number, μ, (i.e. the smallest number of cuts that suffice to unlink all the remaining rings) and the maximum cutting number, M, (i.e. the largest number of cuts that can be applied to unlink all the remaining rings) of a given link are equal to 1. This observation becomes more critical when considering links that possess four or more components. It has been shown, for example, using the more conventional definition of the Borromean property ($\mu = 1$, $M > 1$), that a four-component Borromean link exists where $M = 2$. Lacan's definition coincides with the conventional definition only in that $\mu = 1$.

2 The French translation of Fromm's Sigmund Freud's Mission; an analysis of his personality and influence was published under the title La Mission de Sigmund Freud: une analyse de sa personnalité et de son influence by Éditions Complexe, not Gallimard.

3 Strictly speaking, the diagram on the left comprising straight lines is not a (Borromean) link, for in supposing the (blue and green) lines to be infinite, it omits the sixth crossing point that would specify the nature of their linkage. The same applies to all Lacan's subsequent diagrams using straight lines.

4 Here and on p. 111, when Lacan uses chiffre, which would more conventionally be rendered as 'number', or '(numerical) figure', we have opted for its English cognate 'cipher', to accommodate the notion of an enciphered metaphorization of number.

5 Lacan pronounces pen-se in a way that might suggest pense-ce, 'ponder this'; but perhaps also panse, which he will mention in lesson IV, punning on the homophony between verb and noun.

6 As reproduced here, the link is not in minimal projection: the ten overlaps are reducible to nine crossings, producing L9a34 (Rolfsen notation 9^2_6). However, one unofficial typescript of this lesson reproduces the link in a slightly different form: as L10a115.

7 What Lacan calls nœud à trois (in reference to the knot's crossing number: 3) is translated here and hereafter as 'trefoil knot' (Rolfsen notation 3_1).

Chapter III. On the Knot as the Subject's Support

1 This figuration effectively switches from a link presentation to a braid presentation, and in so doing is perfectly coherent with Alexander's theorem. Each trefoil knot is cut into the strands of a braid, which is allowed by the isomorphism between the knot group of the trefoil and the braid group of degree three (B_3). As Lacan indicates in the following paragraph, different braids could give rise to the same link.

Chapter IV. Joyce and the Fox Riddle

1 This link is not L6a4, since it has a crossing number of 20. It might be more accurate to say that this link is a further version of a three-component Brunnian link.
2 Again, this link is distinct from either of the two shown in the two previous planar diagrams in that it possesses a crossing number of 24. It is, however, yet another version of a three-component Brunnian link.
3 The written form Yad'lun is an attempt to capture Lacan's concentrated pronunciation of Y a de l'Un, itself an informal contraction of Il y a de l'Un: 'There is Oneness' or 'There is something of the One'. Thus, not only does the content of the expression indicate the prominence of the One, but its very form presents as a unitary element.
4 The French esprit embraces 'spirit', 'mind' and, perhaps most pertinently here, 'wit'.
5 Je le panse . . . donc je l'essuie is a deliberate play on the French translation for cogito, ergo sum: je pense donc je suis. Panse signifies both 'bandage' and 'stomach' or 'belly', as in the belly of a vase. Essuyer signifies both 'to suffer' and 'to clean' (with the possible implication here of tending a wound).

Chapter V. Was Joyce Mad?

1 Ne se pense que le corps, perhaps contains a further pun on panse: ne se panse que le corps.
2 L7a1 (Rolfsen notation 7^2_6).

Chapter VI. Joyce and Imposed Words

1 Lacan's knot is more commonly known today as a 'three-twist knot' (Rolfsen notation 5_2). See chapter I, endnote 1.
2 As noted by the translator of Lacan's interview with the patient (who was given the pseudonym Gérard Primeau), the French word assastinat, translated here by a neologism in order to preserve the homophony, is the recognized term for an 'assistantship' in a medical context. Cf. 'A Lacanian Psychosis: Interview by Jacques Lacan' in Returning to Freud: Clinical Psychoanalysis in the School of Lacan, edited and translated by S. Schneiderman, New Haven and London: Yale University Press, 1980, p. 21.

3 L7a1.
4 Left: L5a1 (Rolfsen notation 5^2_1); right: L4a1 (Rolfsen notation 4^2_1). Neither of these links is in minimal projection.
5 Lacan's term 'figure-of-eight knot' is misleadingly redolent of 'figure-eight knot', the alternative label for Listing's knot. It would be less diverting to refer to these projections of L5a1 as a 'figure-of-eight link'.
6 A different projection of L7a1.
7 Se lie is homophonic with se lit, 'gets read'. A lit is also a bed.

Chapter VII. On a Fallace that Vouches for the Real

1 More precisely the Hopf link or L2a1 (Rolfsen notation 2^2_1).
2 The transverse plane and the horizontal plane are generally taken to be synonymous. The more widely accepted term for the third plane is the 'coronal plane' (occasionally, 'frontal plane').
3 The antiquated French noun fallace means 'deception'. Its loose homophony with 'phallus' has led us to leave it un-Englished here.

Chapter VIII. On Sens, Sex and the Real

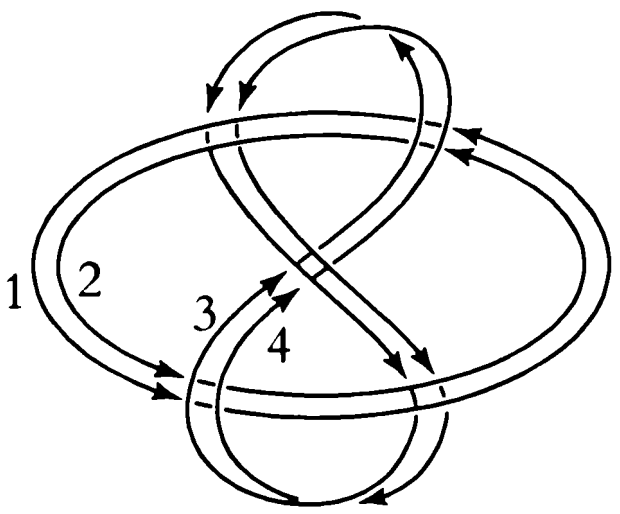
1 Prendre des vessies pour des lanterns is a French idiom, dating back at least to the fourteenth century, used to denote someone's credulity. A common English-language equivalent is, 'to think the moon is made of green cheese'.
2 We have respected the practice introduced by Sylvana Tomaselli and John Forester of italicizing ego when the word ego appears in the French text (in contrast to the roman face 'ego' used for the French moi). See the 1986 note included in their respective translations of the first two books of Lacan's Seminar.
3 This link, described in Milnor's 1954 paper (in Annals of Mathematics 59 (2): 177–195), is more widely known as the Whitehead link (after J. H. C. Whitehead) or L5a1 (Rolfsen notation 5^2_1).
4 The link that results from these four components comprises a Bing double and two satellite rings with zero Whitehead torsion. This one is equivalent to L10n107. Some of the unofficial typescripts of this lesson reproduce an illustration of the link, indicating that Lacan drew it on the blackboard. The following diagram shows the link as it features in Milnor's 1954 paper (not in minimal projection):



Chapter IX. From the Unconscious to the Real

1 Lacan says 'I awe to tell', and spells out the word 'awe' letter by letter. The Seuil edition modifies to 'ought', which we have respected here, but the reader may like to consider 'awe' in light of Joyce's phrase in Finnegans Wake: 'where Used awe to be he' (16.22).

Chapter X. The Writing of the Ego

1 In this second mention of the term, Lacan drops the feminine article from vie, which amplifies the possible homophony with vide de langage (vide carries a masculine article), 'void of language'.
2 L10a169. Note that the rings R and S are interlinked as a Hopf link (which Lacan usually avoids) and thus, strictly speaking, this is neither a Borromean nor a Brunnian link.

Note

1 Unlike the French edition, the English-language editions of Lacan's Seminar have carried a full index from the very first, as does the present.

Joyce the Symptom

1 We have used 'purstiche' to render poursticher, a combination of poursuivre ('pursue') and pastiche.
2 Our 'protspers' is for pourspère, a combination of pourriture ('rot') and prospère ('prosper'). In the Seuil edition, line-end hyphenation has been introduced, accentuating (perhaps deliberately) the final syllable père ('father'). 'Drearly broadshit' is our rendering of la journiture, a combination of journal ('daily newspaper') and pourriture ('rot'). Journiture also rhymes with nourriture.
3 'Ptom' is for ptôme, the Romanized suffix of symptôme, from the Greek πίπτω ('fall'). Meanwhile, 'bol' is for bole, the Romanized suffix of symbole, from the Greek βάλλω ('throw'). 'The pot-pourrotten' is our rendering of le tout-pourri, which rhymes loosely with both potpourri and Tout-Paris, a seventeenth-century coinage referring to the capital's fashionable 'high society'. 'A dogsbody's life' is an attempt to render bonneriche, which is a contraction of bonne et riche ('hearty and wealthy') and rhymes loosely with boniche ('skivvy'). 'Eturnity' is for étournité, which introduces tour ('turn', or 'round') into éternité.
4 P'titom is a combination of ptôm and petit homme ('little man').

5 Joyce was born on 2 February 1882 so, in fact, had he lived until 1975 he would have been ninety-three.
6 An escabeau is a low stepladder or footstool used as an individual platform or to facilitate individual access to a higher place. In the written version of 'Joyce le Symptôme', Lacan plays on escabeau and 'S.K.beau', thus foregrounding the letter and the notion of 'the beautiful'. See 'A note threaded stitch by stitch', § 5.
7 LOM is homophonic with l'homme ('the man' or 'mankind').
8 Hi han a pas is homophonic with Y'en a pas, the contracted form of Il n'y en a pas ('there isn't any' or 'there are none'). Here, in our translation, 'hee-haw' designates both the donkey's bray and, in keeping with Central Scottish vernacular, 'nothing' or 'next to nothing'.

Presentation at Lacan's Seminar

1 . . . j'en ai marre, marabout . . . is a fragment from a children's schoolyard game called Marabout de ficelle, adapted from a well-known nursery rhyme, Trois petits chats. It employs a dense form of anadiplosis that bears on phonemes (rather than full words) to form a concatenated scheme. It is often chanted in twos, accompanied by hand-clapping games.

Reading Notes

1 In fact, the text to be found on pp. 13–17 of Joyce & Paris is the version that was later printed in Autres écrits, and not the transcript of the Sorbonne lecture (see Jacques-Alain Miller's note introducing the appendices). For an English-language rendering of the Joyce & Paris text, see 'Joyce the Symptom' in The Lacanian Review, Issue 2, 2016.
2 Lifted from George Meredith's The Ordeal of Richard Feverel, and also used in a slightly altered form by Oscar Wilde in De Profundis.
3 Trinity College, Cambridge, of course, and not Trinity College, Dublin, was Isaac Newton's university, first as a student, then as a fellow.
4 . . . and another, by the name of Gelb: Ignace J. Gelb, A Study of Writing, Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1963.
5 Variants include: 'Riddle me that and I'll give you a pint' or 'Riddle me that and you'll escape my bite'.
6 The note corresponds to Ulysses, p. 6, where Dr Norman is mentioned.
7 The strongest trace is to be found in Stephen Hero (p. 34): 'It was part of that ineradicable egoism which he was afterwards to call redeemer that he conceived converging to him the deeds and thoughts of his microcosm.'
8 'Couchmare' resembles cauchemar, the French term for 'nightmare'. The alp is more specifically a demon in German folklore that causes nightmares.
9 Perhaps Lacan is alluding to Joyce's mention of 'nebohood' in Finnegans Wake (235.16), though there is no reference to Moses.

10 Joyce refused to let the schemas be printed in the successive editions of Ulysses. The Linati schema, originally in Italian, first appeared in English translation in Richard Ellmann's Ulysses on the Liffey, New York: Oxford University Press, 1972, pp. 186–90. The Gorman-Gilbert schema first appeared in print in Stuart Gilbert's book: James Joyce's Ulysses: A Study, London: Faber, 1930, p. 30.

11 Especially: 'litterish fragments lurk dormant in [. . .] a pillarbox' (66.25-7); 'a cloudletlitter' (73.29); 'The letter! The litter! And the soother the bitther!' (93.24); 'writing thithaways end to end [. . .] with lines of litters slittering up' (114.17); 'neins to a litter' (202.2); 'an equoangular trillitter' (286.22); 'skittered his litters' (370.6); 'laying out his litterery bed' (422.35); 'an absquelitteris puttagonniante' (512.17-18); 'a litteringture of kidlings' (570.18); and 'type by tope, letter from litter, word at ward' (615.1).

12 This 'confusion of tongues' was first decrypted by William York Tindall in A Reader's Guide to Finnegan's Wake, New York: Farrar Straus and Giroux, 1969, p. 42.

A Note Threaded Stitch by Stitch

1 Guilbaud's 'La théorie des jeux, contribution critique à la théorie de la valeur' was translated into English by A. L. Minkes as 'The Theory of Games', in International Economic Papers, London: Macmillan, 1951, pp. 37–65.

2 Brunschwig's article has never been translated into English. The English-language reader might wish to consult the chapter 'Logic' in Jacques Brunschwig and Geoffrey E. R. Lloyd (eds.), Greek Thought: A Guide to Classical Knowledge, translated under the direction of C. Porter, Harvard University Press, 2000, especially pp. 365–7 (also printed in abridged form as The Greek Pursuit of Knowledge).

3 Here, and throughout the Seminar, we have chosen to render the quantifying tout as 'all'. While this usage conforms to a long-standing tradition of Aristotelian term logic in English, it may be remarked that Robin Smith asserted (drawing on P. T. Geach in Logic Matters, Oxford: Blackwell, 1972, p. 69) that translating ὑπάρχειν παντί as 'belongs to all' is an 'unnecessary barbarism', with the plural form, 'belongs to every', being more advisable ('Preface' to Prior Analytics, Indianapolis: Hackett, 1989, p. ix). This opinion is counter to that of W. and M. Kneale in their 1962 book The Development of Logic (Oxford University Press) who assert: 'in some modern versions of Aristotle's doctrine the difficulties of his account of opposition are unnecessarily aggravated by use of examples and formulae in the plural' (p. 61). Recent translators and commentators have tended to maintain the use of 'all', foremost among them Gisela Striker in her Aristotle's Prior Analytics, Book I, Oxford University Press, 2009; see also M. Malink's note on 'Every and all' from his chapter on 'The Orthodox dictum Semantics' in Aristotle's Modal Syllogistic, Harvard University Press, 2013. As for μὴ πάντες, which Lacan mentions on p. 6 (having already employed it in the 1972 'L'étourdit', Autres écrits, p. 465), this formula does indeed include a plural form, though exactly which passage in the Organon Lacan might be referring to is not clear. There, the phrase occurs just once, in On Sophistical Refutations, X, 170b, 33. A more likely source is the passage from De Interpretatione to which Lacan alludes when he first mentions the pas-tout in his Seminar, on 17 January 1962 (that is, over seven years before Brunschwig's article was written). The precise reference is obfuscated, however, by Lacan's choice of example: the Latinized omnis homo mendax, presumably a nod to Luther's commentary on Psalm 116. In any case, the argument in support of the rendering 'not-whole' to be found in Encore: The Limits of Love and Knowledge (Norton, 1998), p. 7, footnote 28, is as flimsy as it is unprecedented.

4 Jacques-Alain Miller writes 'lawfull' (sic), but the mathematical term 'lawlike' might be more suitable.

5 Here we have used the translation provided by L. T. Lih in Lenin Rediscovered: 'What is to Be Done?' in Context (Leiden: Brill, 2006, p. 27).

6 Alan Sheridan (in Écrits: A selection, London: Tavistock, 1977, p. 202) translated liegen lassen as '[left] in the lurch' (and, on p. 205, as 'let-lie'). Russell Grigg followed suit on p. 127 of The Seminar Book III, The Psychoses, Norton/Routledge, 1993.

7 We are quoting from Joan Stambaugh's Being and Time; A Translation of Sein und Zeit, Tübingen: Max Niemeyer Verlag, 1953; revised by Dennis J. Schmidt, New York: SUNY, 1996. John MacQuarrie and Edward Robinson give the very similar formula: 'The Existential Structure of the Authentic Potentiality-for-Being which is Attested in the Conscience' in their Being and Time, Blackwell, 1962. Jacques-Alain Miller cites from the Emmanuel Martineau translation, published by 'the appropriately named' Authentica Press, 1985; noting that he prefers this version over the François Vezin translation, Gallimard, 1986. It should also be noted that some scholars have highlighted a distinction between the echt (genuine) and the eigentlich (authentic) in Sein und Zeit. The former denotes the way concepts are drawn from entities and phenomena, the latter the entities and phenomena themselves (when they are deemed to be apt to yield insight into the ontology of existence). Heidegger also occasionally employs a third term, genuin, though not in a technical sense and with no apparent bearing on the above distinction.

8 Jacques-Alain Miller cites p. 213 of the Martineau translation, and p. 356 of the Vezin. Martineau gives ouverture authentique and Vezin ouvertude authentique to render eigentliche Erschlossenheit. (Both Stambaugh and MacQuarrie & Robinson give 'authentic disclosed-ness'.) The bilingual term 'echt ouverture' thus contains an erroneous back-translation, since the adjective Heidegger uses is eigentliche (see previous note).

9 The term Begriff is attested (with the signification 'concept') long before Heidegger. It was used in Germanic mystical theology (cf. Christian Thomasius and Christian Wolff) and took on a specifically philosophical aspect with Kant and, later, Hegel. The Seuil text gives quelque Allemand (p. 86), but the liaison 's' audible on the recording leaves no doubt as to the plural.

10 Jacques-Alain Miller reproduces the French translation by Marie-Pierre Arnaud-Lindet: Abrégé des Histoires Philippiques de Trogue Pompée (available online at Corpus latinorum scriptorum). We have quoted the 1853 translation by John Selby Watson, London: Henry G. Bohn.

11 For this rendering, see: Bossuet, J. B., An Universal History: from the Beginning of the World to the Empire of Charlemagne, translated by D. Ephilstone, London: Evans/Sewell/Fox, 1778, p. 78; reprinted with revised spelling, New York: J & J Harper, 1821, pp. 64-5.

12 Thus taking the Le Bas engraving or the Rembrandt sketch as reference, since the above-cited passage from Justinus specifies that the king's advisors were included within the circle. Neither Livy nor Polybius (Histories, XXIX, 27) are explicit on this point.

13 We owe the first English-language translation of Algarotti's book to another woman of the eighteenth century who came to be taxed with the doubtful accolade of femme savante: Mrs Elizabeth Carter (Sir Isaac Newton's Philosophy Explain'd for the Use of the Ladies. In Six Dialogues on Light and Colours, London: E. Cave, 1739).

14 Jacques Derrida passed away on 9 October 2004, just two months prior to the completion of the appendices to the French edition of Seminar XXIII (see the date to the 'Note' on p. 137 above).

15 Lacan's disparaging remarks on the book and its Preface are actually from the following year's Seminar (cf. the lesson of 14 December 1976).

16 Russell Grigg translates énonciation as 'utterance', and énigme as 'enigma'. We have preferred 'enunciation' due to the fairly widespread tradition of using 'utterance' in English for the converse of énonciation: énoncé. Here and for the corresponding passage in the Seminar above we have used the paraphrase 'enigma of the riddle' to convey the two meanings carried by the French énigme.

17 At the end of his bio-bibliographical references to the single session of the Names-of-the-Father seminar cited here, Jacques-Alain Miller discloses the name of the author concerned: J.-B. Pontalis.

18 An allusion to the French title of Grafton's book: Les Origines tragiques de l'érudition. Une histoire de la note en bas de page (Seuil, 1998).

19 The promised text has yet to appear in its revised form. The remarks in question came in reply to a query from Marcel Ritter at the 26 January 1975 Cartels Study Day held in Strasbourg. A transcript of Lacan's improvised answer was published in issue 18 of Lettres de l'EFP, 1976, pp. 7–12.

20 This page corresponds to p. 34 of 'Spring Awakening' in Analysis, 6, 1995.

21 Babylonian Talmud, Yebamoth 63a. The text in square brackets was added by Jacob Neusner, in The Talmud of Babylonia (13b: Tractate Jebamot chapters 4–6), Atlanta, 1992, p. 142.

22 This reference conforms to the J. Theodor and Chanoch Albeck edition, Bereshit Rabba, p. 152.

23 Pirkê de Rabbi Eliezer (The Chapters of Rabbi Eliezer the Great): According to the text of the manuscript belonging to Abraham Epstein of Vienna, translated by Gerard Friedlander, London, Paul Kegan, 1916, p. 86.

24 'I shall make for him an auxiliary force (a support, a helper, a corroboration, an understudy) as a luminous reflection of him.'

Index

absolute zero 102, 181
Abraham, Nicolas
  The Wolf Man's Magic Word (with Torok) 207 academia, academics 7, 8, 143, 198, 206–7 act 50, 154, 170, 208 sexual act 50 speech act 117
Adam (Ha-adam, The Man) 5, 154, 167, 177, 191
  see also LOM
Adams, Robert Martin Surface and Symbol 51, 53, 55, 101, 169, 171–2 adoration 52, 53
Adorno, Theodor
  The Jargon of Authenticity 193 affectivity 126
Aksakof, Alexandr 204
Aladdin pantomimes 157
Algarotti, Francesco
  Il Newtonianismo per le dame 202, 229n all (tout) 6, 91, 184 see also not-all
Allégret, Marc 208
Al-Tikriti, Saddam Hussein Abd al-Majid 199 analytic discourse 103, 105 anarchy 119
Anderson, Chester G.
  Viking edition of A Portrait of the Artist as a Young Man 53
Antiochus IV Epiphanes 196–7, 199, 202, 211
appondering see pondering
Aquinas, Saint Thomas (Thomism) 6, 7, 8, 158, 163, 167
  Claritas 6, 193 sinthomasaquinas 6, 9, 185
Aravantinou, Mando
  'Joyce et ses amis grecs' 166 arbitrariness 10, 213 arbitration 10
Aristophanes 215
Aristotle 6, 126, 184, 190
  Organon 6, 184, 228n
  Poetics 165
armillary sphere 24, 91
Arnold, Vladimir 193
art, artisanal 13–14, 28, 29–30, 47, 50, 53, 65, 99, 152, 161, 185
  Joyce's art 7, 13–14, 27–8, 56, 60, 72, 77, 79, 99, 106, 127
Asher, Nicolas
  'Toward a Geometry of Common Sense' (with Vieu) Atherton, James S.
  The Books at the Wake 144, 147, 148, 175
Aubert, Jacques 8, 62, 64–5, 101, 141, 143, 145, 177, 200
  The Aesthetics of James Joyce 6, 165
  Hôtel-Dieu 'evening event' 103, 106–7, 176 inviting Lacan to Joyce Symposium 4, 136, 141
  Joyce as redeemer 64–5
  Joyce avec Lacan 136
  Joyce & Paris (with Jolas) 166–7 presentation at Seminar 58, 59–61, 107, 137, 149–165
  'Reading notes' 137, 166–175
  translation of Ulysses 136 Aufhebung 185, 198 augury 169
  see also divination
Azariah ben, Eleazar 215–16

Babylonian Talmud 215–17, 230n bag 9–10, 18, 51, 126, 190
Bataille, Georges 177, 178, 198–9
  Madame Edwarda 199
Bataille, Sylvia see Lacan, Sylvia Battle of Mentana 203
Beach, Sylvia 133

beauty 6, 219
see also Hogarth, William, The Analysis of Beauty ('line of beauty') Beebe, Maurice
'The Artist as Hero' 8, 168
Begriff 10, 70, 190, 229n being 152, 153, 187, 222n Being of colour 97 radiance of Being 6, 185
see also parlêtre
belief 7, 11, 26, 52, 54–6, 63, 64, 65, 118, 129, 212
Bénichou, Paul 198, 199
Bhagavad Gita 204
The Bible 109
Book of Daniel 199
Book of Revelation 165
Book of Wisdom (Wisdom of Solomon) 108–9, 217
Deuteronomy 174
Genesis 5, 116, 155, 162, 177–8, 215–6
Vulgate (Saint Jerome translation) 154
Bing, R. H. 222n
Blavatsky, Madame Helena 105, 173, 211, 216
The Key to Theosophy 204
Isis Unveiled 148, 203 life and career of 203–6
Secret Doctrine 204
Blavatsky, Nikifor 203
Bloch, Oscar
Dictionnaire étymologique de la langue française (with von Wartburg) 142
Bloom, Leopold 55, 58–9, 147, 150–7, 163–5, 167, 170, 174
Bloom couple 167
Bloom's father, Rudolph 150, 155–6, 129
Bloom, Molly 162 blindness 9 body 54, 68, 91, 170 affect and 126, 129 consistency and 10, 52 dance and 133 drives and 9, 128
having a 129, 133
as imaginary 36, 43, 52, 120, 129, 146 Stephen and his body 128, 129, 168 organs and 21, 51, 190 orifices and 9, 128
parlêtre and 27
resonance and 9, 29
sinthome and 185
unconscious and 103, 116, 119, 128–9 unity of body 190 see also dropping and form
Book of Daniel see Bible Book of Revelation see Bible
Book of Wisdom see Bible
Borromean rings see knots and links
'Borromean knot' (as misnomer) 60, 70, 71, 75, 110, 111, 124, 222n Borromeo family 11, 112, 180
Bosom of Abraham 141
Bossuet, Jacques-Bénigne
An Universal History 197, 229n
Brahma 205
Brentano, Clemens 216
Briant, Pierre
'La tradition gréco-romaine sur Alexandre le Grand dans l'Europe moderne et contemporaine' 197 British empire 146, 168,
British psychoanalytic tradition 9
Brod, Max 208
Brousse, François
Les Secrets kabbalistiques de la Bible 216
Brunnian link see knots and links
Bruno, Giordano 167
Brunschwig, Jacques
'La proposition particulière et les preuves de non-concluance chez Aristote' 184, 227–8n
Byron, Lord 128

Cahiers pour l'analyse 184
Cantor, Georg 10, 188–91
Carnap, Rudolf
'Elimination of Metaphysics through Logical Analysis of Language' 211 Carroll, Lewis 144
see also Tweedledum and Tweedledee
Carter, Elizabeth
Isaac Newton's Philosophy Explain'd for the Use of the Ladies 229n castration 5, 69, 99, 107, 130, 198, 201 catastrophe theory 194
see also singularity and Thom, René Catholicism see Roman Catholic Church cause 26, 51, 57, 207
Cesbron-Lavau, Henri 30
Châtelet, Émilie du 104, 201–3
Chemama, Roland 29
China 118, 217
Chomsky, Noam 21, 26, 28–29, 32, 192
Chouraqui, André 116 Church see Roman Catholic Church circularity 19–20, 24–5, 27, 36, 68, 70, 146, 219 circle and cross 124, 147 circle and hole 15, 67–8, 70, 99, 125 circle and infinite straight line 16, 22, 23–4, 95–6, 99, 100, 117, 125, 129 circle and sphere 91 circle and set 91–2, 199 circular itinerary of letter (Derrida) 208 going round in circles 74, 105–6, 189, 198, 200, 202, 212 as perfect form 186 of Popillius 91, 196–200, 229n

Cixous, Hélène 87, 209
Portrait de Dora 87–8, 209
Clément, Catherine 209 clitoris 68–9 cognizance 26, 50
Cohen, Morris Raphael
An Introduction to Logic and Scientific Method (with Nagel) 211
Colas, Dominique 220
Le Léninisme 220
Colet, Louise 202 collective unconscious 106, 114, 117 colouring (of knots and links) 23–4, 40, 42, 60, 82, 89, 92–3, 95–7 common noun 73
concentricity 23, 70, 96
Connolly, Cyril 172
The Unquiet Grave; A Word Cycle by Palinurus 172
Connolly, Thomas 63, 172
Scribbledehobble: The Ur-Workbook for Finnegans Wake 63, 172 consistence 10, 15, 24, 25, 26, 28, 38, 41, 44, 49, 51–2, 60, 68, 70, 80, 190 see also imaginary constant number 111, 114, 119, 215 constraint, effects of 178–9 contempt (mépris) 52, 106, 183, 207 contradiction 117–8 Copernicus, Nicolaus 201 copula 105
copulation 102–3, 105, 108
Cork 127, 161, 174
Corneille, Pierre
Rodogune 196
Cousin, Victor
Lectures on the True, the Beautiful and the Good 185, 218
Couton, Georges 196
Cranly 64, 173
Crick, Francis 21
Crowell, Richard H.
Introduction to Knot Theory (with Fox) 181

Dalí, Salvador 91, 181 dance 133
death drive see drive
Dedalus, Stephen 53–7, 73, 144, 147, 156–62, 165, 166, 168, 169, 170, 171, 173 definite article 8, 108, 184, 221
Deledalle, Gérard 192
Deleuze, Gilles
Anti-Oedipus (with Guattari) 190 demonstration 10, 31–2, 84, 93, 189, 200 monstration and 93–5
Derrida, Jacques 124, 206–210, 216, 229n
Edmund Husserl's 'Origin of Geometry': An Introduction 210
'Le facteur de la vérité' 207–9
'For the Love of Lacan' 207–8
Preface to The Wolf Man's Magic Word 207, 229n
Writing and Difference 207
Desargues, Girard 96, 200–1
see also point at infinity
Descartes, René 32, 216
'Dioptrique' 187 desire 26, 57, 72, 168, 209, 214 see also cause dextrorotatory see orientation dialogue between Soury and Thomé 37, 200
Dieudonné, Jean 192 discourse of the master 14 disgust 129, 131 dit-mension 124–5, 189
divination 28, 169 division 10, 14–15, 20, 26, 127–8 Dostoyevsky, Fydor 56 dream 56, 101, 109, 202, 213
Finnegans Wake as 105–6, 141, 143, 148 drive (Trieb) 9, 128, 213, 215 death drive 106 dropping 129, 187
Dublin 7, 105, 147, 156, 158, 169, 227n ear 9, 14, 159, 160

Eastman, Max 168 echt 69, 193, 229n
see also Heidegger, Martin
Edison, Thomas 204
Ego 103
ego (moi) 204, 225n
Joyce's Ego 127, 130–34
Lust-Ich 133–4, 200
narcissism and 130, 133–4 einziger Zug see unary trait
Einstein, Albert 117, 186, 187, 204
Eliot, T. S. 204
Ellmann, Richard
James Joyce (biography) 127, 167–8, 173, 174
Selected Letters of James Joyce 63, 172
Ulysses on the Liffey 227n Emmerich, Anne-Catherine 216 empty set 10, 189–91, 199 energetics 111, 115, 213 the phallus and 119
sinthome and 114
English language, lalinglish 3–4, 5, 8, 59, 114, 145, 146 énigme (enigma, riddle) 53, 116, 133, 169, 229–30n 'enigma of a manner' 65, 173 of enunciation 10, 53, 133, 210–13 epiphany 134, 156 157–8, 174 equivalence 10, 40, 60, 82–4, 118 equivoque 6, 9, 10, 78, 80–1, 93, 97, 98, 118, 133, 143, 144, 153

eron (ἐρῶν) 128 escabeau 145, 177, 185, 198, 226n esprit 150, 224n eternity 128, 130
  eturnity 141, 226n
Euclid 9
Euclidian space 200
Eve, L'Ève 5, 108, 191, 222n ex-sistence 10, 11, 28, 31–2, 34, 44, 47, 51, 60, 146, 190 of the real 25, 38, 44, 47, 52, 212 extension 132, 188, 210–11 eye 14, 70

Fabre d'Olivet, Antoine 216, 230n fact (doing) 10, 52 see also fashioning fallace 93, 95, 97, 225n fantasy 14, 105, 107–8 fashioning (faire) 51, 99, 114, 124, 132 father see Name-of-the-Father feeble-mindedness 26, 148, 170 female eroticism 107 female sexuation 184
  see also not-all
Février, James Germain
  Histoire de l'écriture 54, 170
Feynman, Richard P. 215
Fibonacci sequence 183, 219
Field, Judith V. 200–1
  The Geometrical Work of Girard Desargues 201
  The Invention of Infinity (with Gray) 201
Fioretti di San Francesco 65
Flammarion, Camille 204
folisophy 108, 214–8
foreclosure (Verwerfung) de facto 72–3 of sens 102
form 9, 51, 190
  'form of my form' (Ulysses) 169
  'perfect' form of circle 186
  Platonic 9 framing 127
Foucault, Michel
  Les Mots et les Choses 200
Fox, Ralph H.
  Introduction to Knot Theory (with Crowell) 181 fox fox riddle 57, 162, 171
  fox theme 162
Franciscanism 65, 173
Freeman's Journal 6, 167
Freud, Sigmund 4, 20, 30, 63, 64, 69, 84, 101, 106, 109, 111, 115, 119, 120, 128, 130, 132, 133, 143–4, 146, 172, 173, 175, 178, 180, 183, 202, 203, 206, 212, 214, 217
  'Dostoevsky and parricide' 56
  'Drives and their fates' 215
  'The economic problem of masochism' 63
  Fragment of an Analysis of a Case of Hysteria (Dora) 87–8 Group Psychology and the Analysis of the Ego (einziger Zug) 125, 210 hypothesis of the unconscious 105, 112, 113, 116, 129, 201
  'Inhibitions, symptoms and anxiety' 213
  Interpretation of Dreams 213
  Jokes and Their Relation to the Unconscious 80
  Project for a Scientific Psychology 112, 213 Totem and Taboo 130, 214
  'The Uncanny' 36
  'Was will das Weib?' (Jones, Ernest, Sigmund Freud: Life and Work, Vol. II) 53 frog and ox 9
Fromm, Erich
  Sigmund Freud's Mission; an analysis of his personality and influence 20, 223n
Fumaroli, Marc 218

Gaelic 3, 114, 146
Galilei, Galileo 201
Gandhi, Mohandas K. (Mahatma) 204 Garibaldi, Giuseppe 203 gaze 9, 70, 97
Geach, Peter Thomas
  Logic Matters 228n
Gelb, Ignaz J.
  A Study of Writing 54, 227n
Genesis see Bible geometry 18, 21, 36, 70, 95, 131–2, 181, 186, 197 mereotopology and 218 mos geometricus (more geometrico) 9, 18, 22, 93–5, 186 projective geometry 200–1
Gide, André 178, 208–9
Gide, Madeleine 208–9
Gilbert, Stuart 127
  James Joyce's Ulysses: A Study 227n
  Letters of James Joyce Vol. I 172 glove (inside-out) 68–9, 70
God 5, 7, 47, 50, 52, 65, 116, 126, 150, 177, 199, 215, 221
  Other of the Other 47, 108
  Sun-God 205
  see also jouissance, God's jouissance
González, Gloria 76
Goodman, Nelson 29

Gorman, Herbert Sherman 227n
James Joyce: His First Forty Years 127, 174
Gracián, Baltasar 182
Grafton, Anthony
The Footnote: A Curious History 212–3, 228n
Gray, Jeremy John
The Geometrical Work of Girard Desargues (with Field) 201
Grigg, Russell 228n, 229–30n
Guattari, Felix
Anti-Oedipus (with Deleuze) 190
Guénon, René 148, 206, 216
Guilbaud, Georges-Théodule 181
'The Theory of Games' 181, 227n half-saying (mi-dire) 5, 14, 20, 182

Halmos, Paul
Naive Set Theory 189
Ḥanukkah 197
Hapel, Bruno
René Guénon et le Roi du monde 206
Hart, Clive
Structure and Motif in Finnegans Wake 124, 144–5
Hayek, Friedrich A.
The Counter-Revolution of Science 218
Hebrew 5, 215–6
Hegel, Georg F. W. 185, 217, 229n
Elements of the Philosophy of Right 16, 191–92, 198
Heidegger, Martin 69, 181, 193, 209
Being and Time 191, 228–9n helpmeet (ezer k'negdo) 20, 116, 177–8, 215–6, 220
Heraclitus 189
Hermes 162–3
heresy (haeresis) 7, 137, 167, 169, 185, 198, 210
Heron 128 history 54, 98, 104, 105, 106, 108, 145, 173, 183, 196, 198 Hoffman, E. T. A.
The Devil's Elixirs 36
Hogarth, William
The Analysis of Beauty ('line of beauty') 54, 170, 218–20 hole 15–16, 28, 29, 60, 70, 91, 116, 125–6, 128, 154–5, 159, 212, 213 false hole 15–16, 28, 67, 98–9 hole in the real 21, 22, 26 symbolic as hole 25, 28, 30, 38, 44, 115 true hole 15–16, 67, 115
Home Rule 6, 167
Homer
The Odyssey 146–7 see also Telemachus and Ulysses
Houdebine, Jean-Louis
'La Trinité de Joyce, I et II' (with Sollers) 170
Houdetot, Sophie d' 200
Hurcanus, Eliezer ben
Pirke de-Rabbi Eliezer 216, 230n
Husserl, Edmund 210, 218 hysteria see neurosis hysteron (ὕστερον) 53

Ibsen, Henrik
Rosmersholm 56 idea 98, 111, 112 idea of the all 91 idea of eternity 128 ideology 65, 198, 218
the imaginary 10–11, 21, 26, 36–7, 43, 70, 84, 112, 131, 134, 156–9, 163–4, 186, 190, 208 imagination, self-love and 52 real and symbolic and 11, 12–13, 15, 18, 25, 27, 37, 38–42, 43–4, 50, 71, 75, 77, 89, 102, 113, 120, 126, 147, 148, 178, 181–2 symbolic and 51, 57–8, 75, 102
real and 98
uncanny and 36
see also body and consistence imperium 10 im-ply-cation 11, 117, 118–9 imposed words 78–9, 118 impossibility 5, 26, 31, 50, 98, 104, 106, 118, 184–5 impression 112
infinite straight line (droite infinie, DI) 16, 23, 51, 67, 69, 95–6, 100, 117, 125–6, 223n infinity infinite series 183, 194 infinite universe 184 see also point at infinity inhibition 36, 126 initiation 20, 147–8, 204 instant of seeing 70, 199 intension 132, 193, 211–13 interpretation 8–9, 28, 101, 112, 211 instinct 9 intuition 70, 130, 199
intuitionistic mathematics 184–5 invention 26, 73, 110–11, 132, 193, 201, 206–7 of the real 110, 113, 185, 212
Ireland 3, 6, 143, 146, 158, 163, 204
Irish annals 143

Jacopone da Todi 65
Jakobson, Roman 184, 192
Jesuits 72, 106, 142, 162, 169, 173
Jesus 157, 171
Jolas, Maria

Joyce & Paris (with Aubert) 166–7
Jones, Ernest 143–4, 159
Sigmund Freud: Life and Work 53, 143–4 jouissance 29, 190, 214
God's jouissance 47
Joyce's jouissance 129, 144, 146, j'ouïs-sens 58
jouissance of the barred Other (JA) 43, 50, 58 jouissance of the imaginary body 43 jouissance of the real 58, 63 penile jouissance 43 phallic jouissance (JΦ) 43–4 sexual jouissance 47
see also esprit
Joyce Symposium (Paris, 1975) 4, 136, 141
Joyce, James
'The Bruno Philosophy' 167
Chamber Music 146, 175
Dubliners 157, 160, 161, 164, 167
Epiphanies 134, 157–8, 174
Exiles 56, 160, 168
Finnegans Wake 4, 59, 79, 105, 106, 141, 142, 143, 144–5, 147, 148, 164, 167, 172, 173, 175, 191, 221, 225n, 227n
see also Plurabelle Anna Livia; Shaun; Shem
Letters of James Joyce 63, 68, 79, 171–2, 174
Poems and Shorter Writings 174
A Portrait of the Artist as a Young Man 8, 14, 53, 55, 56, 64, 65, 72, 79, 128, 154, 156, 158, 161, 162, 164, 167, 168, 169, 170, 173, 174, 214
see also Cranly; Dedalus, Stephen; Heron
Stephen Hero 7–8, 65, 72, 157–8, 164, 173, 226n
Ulysses 3, 13, 53, 55, 56–7, 59, 79, 127, 133, 136, 142, 144, 146–7, 149–65, 167–75, 227n see also Bloom, Leopold; Bloom, Molly; Dedalus, Stephen; Mulligan, Buck Joyce, John Stanislaus 7, 72, 77, 164, 167
Joyce, Lucia 78, 79–80, 173
Joyce, Nora (née Barnacle) 56, 63, 68, 168, 171–2, 174
Judge, William Quan 203
Jung, Carl Gustav 64, 106, 173 see also collective unconscious Justinus, Marcus Justianius (Justin)
Epitome of the Philippic History of Pompeius Trogus 196, 229n

Kabbalah 216, 217
see also Zohar
Kafka, Franz 208
Kandinsky, Wassily 204
Kant, Immanuel 104, 158, 229n
De Mundi Sensibilis atque Intelligibilis Forma et Principiis 68, 200
Kasner, Edward
Mathematics and the Imagination (with Newman) 180
Keller, Émile 218
Kelvin, Lord, William Thomson 181, 195 see also absolute zero
Kenner, Hugh
'The Portrait in Perspective' 8, 168
Dublin's Joyce 168
Kepler, Johannes 186
Klee, Paul 204
Kneale, Martha
The Development of Logic (with W. Kneale) 228n Kneale, William
The Development of Logic (with M. Kneale) 228n
The KnotPlot Site 195
knots and links
Hopf link (L2a1/Rolfsen notation 2^2_1) 90, 225n, 226n three-component Borromean link (L6a4/Rolfsen notation 6^3_2) 11–13, 15, 22, 24–25, 36, 43, 48, 57, 67, 71, 89, 91, 99, 100, 115, 119, 224n three-component 'Borromean' (Brunnian) links 48–9, 224n trefoil knot/overhand knot (Rolfsen notation 3_1) 31, 33–4, 37, 38–9, 41, 42, 44, 58, 70–2, 75, 76, 77, 81, 82, 89, 181, 193, 223n four-component 'Borromean' (Brunnian) links 12, 17, 19, 34–5, 39, 42, 77, 134
'Lacan's knot'/three-twist knot (Rolfsen notation 5_2) 3, 76, 223n
L4a1/Rolfsen notation 4^2_1 81, 224n
L7a1/Rolfsen notation 7^2_6 72, 80, 83, 225n
L9a34/Rolfsen notation 9^2_6 27, 223n
L10a115 223n
L10a169 131, 225n
L10n107 225n
linknot 58, 70, 93, 193–5
Listing's knot (Rolfsen notation 4_1) 76
Unknot (Rolfsen notation 0_1) 71, 75, 194–5 folded into figure of eight, and false trefoil 72
Unlink 12, 15, 98, 223n
Whitehead link (L5a1/Rolfsen notation 5^2_1) 81, 82, 103, 224n, 225n
Kofman, Sarah
Quatre romans analytiques 36
'Vautour rouge' 36

Koyré, Alexandre 201
Kreisel, Georg 192
Kripke, Saul
  Naming and Necessity 211–12

Lacan, Jacques
  De la psychose paranoïaque dans ses rapports avec la personnalité 41
  'Direction of the treatment and the principles of its power' 202
  'Écrits "inspirés": schizographie' 63, 210
  'L'étourdit' 184, 214, 228n
  'The Freudian Thing' 113
  'On Freud's Trieb and the psychoanalyst's desire' 215
  'Function and field of speech and language' 181, 182
  'Geneva Lecture on the symptom' 222n
  'Joyce the Symptom' (text) 136, 185, 227n
  'Lituraterre' 87, 175, 207, 209
  'Note italienne' 221
  'Position of the unconscious' 215
  'Proposition of 9 October on the Psychoanalyst of the School' 211
  'La psychanalyse. Raison d'un échec' 181, 206
  'Psychoanalysis and its teaching' 183
  'On a question preliminary to any possible treatment of psychosis' 187, 199, 214
  'Radiophonie' 178, 186, 190, 201
  'Seminar on "The Purloined Letter"' 179, 207–9
  Seminar III, The Psychoses 187, 228n
  Seminar VII, The Ethics of Psychoanalysis 178, 201, 220
  Seminar VIII, Transference 214–5
  Seminar IX, L'identification 228n
  Seminar X, Anxiety 178, 187, 209
  Seminar XI, The Four Fundamental Concepts of Psychoanalysis 192, 200, 210, 213, 214, 215
  Seminar XII, Problèmes cruciaux pour la psychanalyse 192, 215
  Seminar XIII, L'objet de la psychanalyse 96, 200
  Seminar XVI, D'un Autre à l'autre 180, 183, 217
  Seminar XVII, The Other Side of Psychoanalysis 198, 212, 214
  Seminar XIX, ...or Worse 180, 181
  Seminar XX, Encore 60, 104, 107, 181, 183, 190, 200, 206
  Seminar XXII, RSI 40, 178–9, 181–2
  Seminar XXIV, L'insu que sait de l'une-bévue s'aile à mourre 229n
  'The signification of the phallus' 99, 201, 209
  'On the subject who is finally in question' 185
  'Spring awakening' 214, 230n
  'Television' 140, 169, 184, 201, 215, 217, 221
  'La Troisième' 181
  'The youth of Gide or the letter and desire' 208–9
'Lacan's knot' see knots and links Lacan, Sylvia (formerly Bataille, née Maklès) 176–8 lalingua (lalangue) 3, 6, 98, 146, 222n lamella 29–30, 215 language 21–2, 26, 28, 29, 30, 32, 79, 101–2, 103, 105, 128, 146, 161, 192, 211, 212, 225n lapsus calami and lapsus linguae 134
Larbaud, Valery 127
Last Judgment 47
Laurent, Éric 136
Law 124, 132, 161, 174 lawless sequences 185
  real as 120, 212
Lawrence, D. H. 204
Le Bas, Jacques-Philippe
  'Antiochus enfermé dans un cercle par Popilius' 194, 229n
Le Bovier de Fontenelle, Bernard 202
Lenin, Vladimir 183, 186–7
  What is to be Done? 117, 186, 220, 228n letter 6, 54, 112, 125, 145, 175, 207–210, 220n, 226n, 227n Gide's letters 178, 208–9 mathematical letters 54, 91–2
    see also parlêtre
Lévi-Strauss, Claude 181–2 levorotatory see orientation
Lévy, Bernard-Henri
  'Pour une charte de la psychanalyse' 183
  'La cause de Freud' 183 libido 29–30, 215
Library of Alexandria 208 lie (mendacity) 8–9, 26, 51, 52, 125, 132, 212, 222n Linati, Carlo 127, 174, 227n line of beauty see Hogarth, William, The Analysis of Beauty ('line of beauty') linguistics 28–9 links see knots and links Listing, Johann Benedict 181 see also knots and links, Listing's knot Livius, Titus (Livy) 196, 197–8, 229n
LOM 145, 226n
love 29, 59, 63, 108, 130 eternal love 128, 130 self-love see mentality

Lust-Ich see Ego
Luther, Martin
  Scholion on Romans 8 228n

Maccabean revolt 197 madness 59, 62, 63, 71, 78, 173
Major, René 207
Malevich, Kazimir 204
Malink, Marko
  Aristotle's Modal Syllogistic 228n
Mallarmé, Stéphane 171, 189 mania see psychosis
Mankiewicz, Joseph L.
  Julius Caesar 196
Manu 205
manvantara 105, 203, 204–6
Mao Zedong 217
MacQuarrie, John, translation of Being and Time (with Robinson) 193, 228–229n Martynov, Aleksandr 186
Marx, Karl 183
masochism 63, 69, 174
  see also sado-masochism Maspero, Gaston 201 master signifier see S_1 matheme 104, 115
Mauas, Marco 220
Mazzotti, Massimo 202 meaning (sens) 28, 43, 44, 57, 58, 70, 75, 80, 97–8, 102–3, 112, 114, 129, 144, 211, 214 'ideality of a meaning' 208
  real and 50–1, 115, 116
  see also jouissance, j'ouïs-sens and sensibleness Medea 177, 208
melancholia see psychosis mendacity see lie mentality (self-love) 52 see also senti-mentality message 21–2 metaphor 30, 102, 105, 111, 112, 117, 128, 129, 184 paternal metaphor 214 metonymy 30, 172, 184
Michelangelo
  Moses 160–1, 164
Midrash Rabba 215–7 might (pouvoir) 43–4 Miller, Gérard 220
Miller, Henry 204, 206
Miller, Jacques-Alain 83, 106, 182, 200, 217
  'A note threaded stitch by stitch' 176–221
Miller, Judith 6, 136
Milner, Jean-Claude 192
Milnor, John 103, 181, 225n
Milton, John 160
Mimesis: des articulations (collection of articles) 36 mimesis 44
Mishnah 216
Molière
  The Miser 209
Mondrian, Piet 204
Monnier, Adrienne 142, 175 monstration see demonstration
Moore, Thomas 162 mos geometricus (more geometrico) see geometry Mosenthal, Salomon Hermann
  Deborah (Leah) 151–3, 155
Moses 159, 160–2, 174, 197, 227n
Mulligan, Buck 166, 169, 171

Nagel, Ernest
  Introduction to Logic and Scientific Method (with Cohen) 211
Name-of-the-Father 102, 116, 118, 146, 185, 214 as Father of the Name 13, 147 see also père-version narcissism 129, 157, primary narcissism 133–4 nature 4, 141
Nebo 124, 130, 174, 227n necessity 5, 13, 108 nerve centre 125–6 nervous system 112 networks 112, 212, 213 neurosis 42 hysteria 53, 88
  obsessional neurosis 9
Neusner, Jacob 230n
Newman, James
  Mathematics and the Imagination (with Kasner) 180
Newton, Isaac 104, 169, 201–2, 227n node 201 and antinode 30
Node Bo (Nœud Bo) 124–5, 129–30
Norman, Conolly 172, 227 not-all (pas-tout, pas-toute, pas-toutes, mé pantes) 6, 91–2, 184–5, 221, 228n nous (νοῦς) 126
Le Nouvel Âne 183 number as binary 10
  as cipher 111, 223n one and 118, 189
    see also constant number object 31, 32, 43, 101, 200 object a 14, 26, 70, 101, 105, 187, 193, 209, 215 organ and 26 obscenity 54, 202 obscurity 105, 213

obstacle 26, 68, 70, 104
O'Connor, Frank 127
Oedipus complex 13, 214
O'Neill, Peter 'Going Round in Circles: Popular Speech in Ancient Rome' 197
One 10, 50, 118, 126, 189–90 one-all-alone 189–90 one-to-boot 190
  see also Yad'lun oral-anal 70
organ 21, 26, 29, 32, 51, 114, 190, 192, 199 orientation 40, 95–7, 102 dextrorotary and levorotatory 60, 81–2, 95–7
Oshima, Nagisa
  Ai no corrida (In the Realm of the Senses) 107, 176
Ossendowski, Ferdynand Antoni
  Beasts, Men and Gods 216
Other (Autre) 10, 13, barred Other 43, 104, 107–8, 206 empty set and 190
  the Other of 43, 47, 50, 58, 108, 115, 116 ox see frog and ox pan (πάν) 6 see also universal paranoia see psychosis Pascal's wager 180

parlêtre 5, 27, 43–4, 51–2, 84, 222n
Parmenides 189
Parnell, Charles Stewart 162, 168
Pasha, Nubar 203
Paz, Octavio 192
Peirce, Charles Sanders 5, 102 Collected Papers 192 père-version 11, 69, 130, 133
Perry, Victor 196 perversion 11, 131, 132
Perko Jr, Kenneth A.
  'On the classification of knots' 195, 220 personality 41–2
Petit Orsay Theatre 87
phallus 5, 7, 43–4, 69, 99, 119, 206, 214, 225n see also jouissance, phallic jouissance and fallace philia (φιλία) 125, 128 philosophy 6, 9, 125
phonation 61, 79, 107
Picasso, Pablo 74, 214
Picavet, François
  Les Idéologues 218
Pilate, Pontius 52
Plato form 9
  Symposium 214–15
plausibility see vraisemblance
Plurabelle, Anna Livia (ALP) 173–4
Poe, Edgar Allan 215
  'Nevermore' 214
  'The Purloined Letter' 200, 207, 208–9 point at infinity 23–4, 95–6, 117, 200 see also Desargues, Girard police 16, 191–2, 198, 200
Polybius
  The Histories 229n polyhedra 132
pondering (pensée) 18, 26, 32, 37, 38, 47, 50, 68, 75, 80, 106, 111, 124, 223n appondering (appensée) 124, 134 see also time, pondered time
Pontalis, Jean-Bertrand 187, 212, 230n
Popillius Laenas, Gaius 91, 196–200, 202, 217
Popilius Laenas (Lena), Caius 194
Primeau, Gérard 77–80, 224n proper name/noun 61, 73, 77, 142, 151, 212 prudence/caution 60, 151, 155, 163, 211 psychi (ψυχή) 128 psychiatry 4
psychoanalysis 20, 26, 30, 33, 57–8, 59, 103, 105, 108, 115–6, 132, 178, 182, 183, 185, 199, 204, 212, 215 Joyce and 101, 106, 126, 143 psychosis 169, 187 mania 4 melancholia 187 paranoia 41 schizophrenia 78
puns, punning 144, 167

Quine, Willard van Orman 29, 180, 192, 212, 218
  The Time of my Life 192
  Word and Object 211

Rabelais, François 142 ravage 84, 177
Rawlinson, George
  A Manual of Ancient History: from the Earliest Times to the Fall of the Western Empire 197 the real 20, 26, 27, 29, 31–2, 47, 50–1, 54, 62–3, 65, 69–70, 84, 87, 89, 93, 97, 98, 99, 102, 104, 106, 110–111, 112, 113, 114–6, 117, 118–19, 131, 133, 134, 178, 185–6, 193, 212 ex-sistence of 25, 38, 44, 47, 52, 212
  'genetic' real 21–2 hole in the real 21, 22, 26
  imaginary and 10
  odd or end of (un bout de reel) 100, 104, 105, 109, 118, 202
  sinthome/symptom and 7, 28, 58, 113, 114, 120

and symbolic and imaginary 11, 12–13, 15, 18, 25, 27, 37, 38–42, 43–4, 50, 71, 75, 77, 89, 102, 113, 120, 126, 147, 148, 178, 181–2 symbolic and 43, 58, 69, 165
truth and 21, 62–3, 64, 69–70, 97, 113, 118, 193, 212 writing and 54, 64, 110, 116, 132
Recanati, François 212 redemption, redeemer 64–5, 69, 72, 157, 163, 173, 198, 227n Regnault, François
Dieu est inconscient 221
'I was struck by what you said . . .' 217 religion 26, 203, 218
Rembrandt van Rijn
'Popillius and Antiochus' 197, 198, 229n reminiscence (Reminiszenz) 112
Renan, Ernest 218 repression 211 primary repression (Urverdrängung) 30, 211 resonance 9, 29, 30, 191 responsibility 47, 50, 51, 204 riddle see enigma
Ritter, Marcel 230
Robinson, Edward translation of Being and Time (with MacQuarrie) 193, 228–229n Rollin, Charles
Histoire ancienne 196, 197
Roman Catholic Church 64, 72, 146, 158, 159, 167, 168, 171, 173, 199, 202
Rorty, Richard 211
Roudinesco, Élisabeth 220
Histoire de la psychanalyse en France 207
Rousseau, Jean-Jacques 198, 202
Russell, Bertrand
Russell's paradox 188–9

S_1 (master signifier) 10, 14, 73, 113, 179, 190–1, 198
S_2 (knowledge) 14, 73, 112–3, 177, 190–1 Sade, Marquis de 158, 198
sado-masochism 69
Sainte-Beuve, Charles Augustin
Causeries du lundi 201
Saint-Lambert, Jean François de 201–2
Saint-Yves d'Alveydre, marquis de 216 savoir-faire 5, 47, 50, 59, 99, 155, 165
Schmidt, Dennis J. 228n
Schneiderman, Stuart 28–9
Returning to Freud 224n
Schreber, Daniel Paul
Memoirs of my Nervous Illness 187
Schwartz, Jacob 168
Scriabin, Alexander 204 self-love see imaginary
Sels, Nicole 8, 187
sensibleness (sensé) 78, 100–1, 108, 109 senti-ment, senti-mentality 26, 33, 51, 64, 169, 171 sex 4, 47, 97, 102
the sexual 50, 52, 53 sexual relation and non-relation 53, 56, 57, 68, 70, 82, 84, 98, 102, 104, 214 sexuality 132
see also act, sexual act Shakespeare, William Bloom's knowledge of 55, 170
The Tragedy of Hamlet, Prince of Denmark 152–3, 160
The Tragedy of Julius Caesar 196
Shaun 143–4
Shechner, Mark
Joyce in Nighttown 56–7, 171
Shem the Penman 143
Sheridan, Alan 228n signifier 9, 10, 15, 55, 61, 78, 98, 99, 108, 113, 124, 125, 128, 133, 134, 164–5, 167, 170, 187, 190, 192–3, 207–8, 212 see also S_1 and S_2 singularity 194–5, 200, 218
Smith, Robin 228n
Socrates 5–6
Sollers, Philippe 176–8, 183, 187, 199
'L'avenir de la psychanalyse' 183
Femmes 191, 199
'Joyce et C^{ie}' 3, 59, 79, 166, 222n
Paradis 216–17
Lacan même 176, 198, 220
'Oui, je suis Dieu !' 221
'La Trinité de Joyce, I et II' (with Houdebine) 170 soma (σῶμα) 126
see also body
Sossinsky, Alexei
Knots: Mathematics with a Twist 180–1, 195 soul 29, 105, 129, 168, 204
Soury, Pierre 15, 34, 37, 40, 60, 66, 92, 93, 95, 100, 181, 202 speech 7, 8–9, 29, 43, 78, 79, 149–50 speech act see act spiral 70 spiritualism 147
Stambaugh, Joan
Being and Time; A Translation of Sein und Zeit (revised by Schmidt) 193, 228n, 229n
Stavy, Yves-Claude 220
Steiner, Rudolf 204 stimulus-response 111
Strachey, James 215

Strauss, Leo
Persecution and the Art of Writing 182
Striker, Gisela
Aristotle's Prior Analytics 228n sublimation 185 substantialization 26, 28, 30 supervision 9
Sureau, François 218 symbol/symbolic 60, 69, 112, 154, 164, 165, 178, 190–1, 212 as hole 25, 28, 30, 38, 44, 115
imaginary and 10, 51, 57–8, 75, 102
and imaginary and real 11, 12–13, 15, 18, 25, 27, 37, 38–42, 43–4, 50, 71, 75, 77, 89, 102, 113, 120, 126, 147, 148, 178, 181–2 sinthome/symptom and 12, 13, 14, 15, 99, 120, 144
real and 43, 58, 69, 165
syntax 98, 179

Taton, René
L'Œuvre mathématique de Desargues 200
La Géométrie projective en France de Desargues à Poncelet 200
Tel Quel 3, 164, 170
Telemachus 145
telepathy 78–80
Tennyson, Alfred 128
Theosophical Society 203–4 theosophy 181, 199, 203–6
Thibaudet, Albert 218
Thom, René 194
see also catastrophe theory
Thomasius, Christian 229
Thomé, Michel 34, 37, 40, 60, 66, 92, 93, 95, 100, 181, 202
Thomson, William see Kelvin, Lord time 97
pondered time 125, 128
Tindall, William York
A Reader's Guide to Finnegans Wake 225n tool 21, 26
topology 15, 30, 66, 116, 125, 186, 200
Torok, Maria
The Wolf Man's Magic Word (with Abraham) 207 torus 15, 66–7, 69
transference 63, 177, 178
trauma 112, 142
Travers-Smith, Hester
Psychic Messages from Oscar Wilde 175
Tree of Knowledge 5
Trieste 68, 166
Trinity 126, 159, 167, 169
Trinity College, Dublin 53, 169, 227n truth 5, 7, 14, 20, 185, 198, 206 about truth 52, 132, 212 intensional, 132, 193, 212
real and 21, 62–3, 64, 69–70, 97, 113, 118, 193, 212
see also hole, true hole
Tweedledum and Tweedledee 64, 172–3

Ulysses 151, 162, 172 umpire 10, 168
unary trait (einziger Zug) 111, 125, 126, 190–1, 210 uncanny 36–7 unconscious 58, 80, 105, 107, 108, 110, 112, 114, 116–7, 127–8, 131, 134, 144–6, 149, 170, 213, 221 body and 103, 116, 119, 128–9
Freud's hypothesis of 105, 112, 113, 116, 129, 201
sinthome and 42, 84, 119–20, 147
parlêtre and 43
Unerkannt 213–14 universal, universe 6, 50, 184, 188, 189, 191, 199, 205, 211
'stable existence in the universal' 191, 192, 198, 217, 219

Vaillot, René
Madame du Châtelet 201
Vassiliev, Victor 193–5, 200
Velásquez, Diego
Las Meninas 200
Vernant, Jean-Pierre 207
Vico, Giambattista 105, 147
Vieu, Laure
'Toward a Geometry of Common Sense' (with Asher) vision 97 voice 9, 78, 124, 150, 164, 165, 167 Voltaire 196, 198, 201–2 vraisemblance 54, 103, 111

Wartburg, Walther
Dictionnaire étymologique de la langue française (with Bloch) 142
Watson, James Dewey 21
Watson, John Selby 229n
Weaver, Harriet S. 172–173
Whitehead, John Henry Constantine 225n
Wilde, Oscar
The Importance of Being Earnest 144, 175
De Profundis 175, 227n
Wittgenstein, Ludwig 36
Wolff, Christian 229n
Wolfson, Louis
Le Schizo et les langues 172

The Woman (La femme) 5, 91, 108, 184 see also definite article women 6, 91–2, 130, 184 a woman (ein Weib) 53, 56, 69, 84, 98 see also helpmeet and not-all writing 54, 79, 111–12, 124, 125, 126, 127, 131, 133, 172, 210, 213 real and 54, 64, 110, 116, 132
Würzburg school 75
Yad'lun 50, 224n
Yeats, W. B. 204

Zinsser, Judith P.
'Translating Newton's Principia: The Marquise du Châtelet's Revision and Additions for a French Audience' 202
Zohar 216

Seminar 1: Wednesday 16 November 1976

There is a kind of notice which sets out...were you able to read it? What did you make of it? L'insu que sait, all the same that's a bit of blah-de-blah, it equivocates; L'insu que sait, and then I gave a translation of the Unbewusst, I said that there was, in the sense of the use in French of the partitive, that there was de l'une-bévue[1]. It is just as good a way of translating the Unbewusst as any other, as the unconscious, in particular which, in French – and in German also moreover - equivocates with unconsciousness.

The unconscious has nothing to do with unconsciousness. So then why not quite calmly translate it by l'une-bévue. All the more so because this has immediately the advantage of highlighting certain things; why do we feel obliged in the analysis of dreams, which constitutes a bévue like anything else, like a parapraxis, except for the fact that there is something in which one recognises oneself. You recognise yourself in the witticism, because the witticism depends on what I called lalangue, you recognise yourself in the witticism, you slip into it and on this Freud made some remarks that are not unimportant. I mean that the advantage of the witticism for the unconscious is all the same linked to something specific which involves the acquisition of lalangue. Moreover, should we be saying that to analyse a dream we should stick to what happened the previous day? This is not self-evident. Freud made a rule of it, but it would be as well all the same to see that there are many things which, not alone can go further back, but which depend on what could be called the very fabric of the unconscious. Also, is the parapraxis something which ought to be analysed strictly according to what happened, not the previous day, but this time during the day, this is something that really should be questioned.

[1] [1] Lacan's play on Unbewusst and une-bévue cannot be reproduced in English. 'something of a-bungle' or similar expressions miss the point. A practical solution would be for readers to add une-bévue or simply bévue to their Lacanian vocabulary.

This year, let us say that with this L'insu que sait de l'une-bévue, I am trying to introduce something which goes further than the unconscious. What relationship is there between this something which must be admitted, that we have an inside that is called as best one can, psyche for example, we even see Freud writing endo, endo-psychical; it is not self-evident that the psyche should be endo; it is not self-evident that this endo should be endorsed. What relationship is there between this endo, this inside and what we usually call identification? It is this in short that, under this title which is as it were made for this particular occasion, this is what I would like to put under this title. Because it is clear that identification is what is crystallised in an identity. Moreover this fication in French is in German enunciated differently, Identifizierung, says Freud, in a place where I went to rediscover it, because I did not remember that I had done a seminar on Identifizierung. I did not remember, I remembered all the same what was in this chapter, I did not know that I had consecrated a year to it. But I remembered that for Freud there are at least three modes of identification, namely, the identification to which he reserves – I don't really know why – the qualification of love. Love is the qualification that he gives to the identification to the father. What is it on the other hand that he advances in terms of an identification brought about by participation? He calls that, he pinpoints that as hysterical identification. And then there is a third identification which is the one that he constructs from a trait, a trait that formerly – I had all the same held onto the memory of it without knowing that I had done a whole seminar on identification – from a trait that I called 'unary', this unary trait interests us because, as Freud underlines, it is not something particularly connected to a beloved person. A person can be indifferent and a unary trait chosen as constituting the basis of an identification. It is not indifferent, since this is how Freud believes that he is able to account for the identification to the Führer's little moustache which everyone knows played an important role.

It is a very interesting question because it would result in certain remarks that have been advanced that the end of analysis should be to identify oneself to the analyst. For my part, I do not think so. But anyway this is what Balint maintains, and it is very surprising. To what then does one identify oneself at the end of analysis? Is one supposed to identify oneself to one's unconscious? This is what I do not believe. I do not believe it, because the unconscious remains – I say 'remains', I am not saying 'remains eternally', because there is no eternity – remains the Other. It is the Other with a capital O that is at stake in the unconscious. I do not see how one could give a sense to the unconscious, except by situating it in this Other, the bearer of signifiers, which pulls the strings of what is imprudently called, imprudently because it is here that there arises the question of what the subject is from the moment that it so entirely depends on the Other.

So then in what does this mapping out called analysis consist? Might it be or might it not be, to identify oneself, to identify oneself while taking some insurance, a kind of distance, to identify oneself to one's symptom? I put forward that the symptom could be – this can be cashed in, it is pretty common – it can be the sexual partner. This is along the line of what I put forward,- put forward without it making you scream like an osprey – it is a fact, I put forward that the symptom taken in this sense is, to employ the term knowing (connaître), is what you know, it is even what you know best, without that going very far. Knowing has strictly only this sense. It is the only form of knowing taken in the sense in which it has been put forward that it is enough for a man to sleep with a woman for us to be able to say that he knows her, and indeed inversely. Since despite the fact that I strive for it, it is a fact that I am not a woman, I do not know what is involved in terms of what a woman knows about a man. It is very possible that it may go, that it may go very far. But it can all the same not go so far as the woman creating man, even when it is a matter of her children, it is a matter of something that presents itself as a parasitism. In the uterus of the woman, the child is a parasite, and everything indicates that, up to and including the fact that things can go very badly between this parasite and this belly.

So then what does knowing mean? Knowing means being able to deal with the symptom, knowing how to sort it out, knowing how to manipulate it, to know (savoir), this is something that corresponds to what man does with his image, it is to imagine the way in which you can manage this symptom. What is in question here, of course, is secondary narcissism, radical narcissism the narcissism that is called primary being ruled out on this particular occasion. Knowing how to deal with your symptom, that is the end of analysis. We have to recognise that this is pretty limited. It does not really go very far. How it is practised, this is of course what I am striving to convey in this crowd, with what result I do not know. I embarked on this navigation like that, because at bottom I was provoked into doing so. It is what resulted from what was published in some special series or other of Ornicar on the split of 1953. I would surely have been much more discreet if the split of '53 had not happened.

The metaphor in use for what is called access to the real is what is called the model. There is someone called Kelvin who was very interested in that, he was even called Lord, Lord Kelvin. He considered that science was something in which a model was functioning and which allowed, with the help of this model, to foresee what would be the results, the results of the functioning of the Real. One has recourse therefore to the Imaginary to give oneself an idea of the Real. You should write then se faire, 'to give oneself an idea', I said, write it as 'sphere' (sphère) to clearly understand what the imaginary means. What I put forward in my Borromean knot of the Imaginary, the Symbolic and the Real, led me to distinguish these three spheres and then, afterwards, re-knot them. I had therefore to go from these three balls – there are dates, I enunciated the Symbolic, the Imaginary and the Real in '54, I entitled an inaugural lecture with these three names which have become in short through me what Frege calls proper nouns (noms propres). To found a proper noun, is something that elevates your own name (nom propre) a little bit. The only proper name in all of that, is mine.

Lacan's extension to the Symbolic, to the Imaginary and to the Real is what allows these three terms to consist. I am not particularly proud of it. But I after all noticed that to consist meant something, namely, that one had to speak about body; there is a body of the Imaginary, a body of the Symbolic – this is lalangue – and a body of the Real about which we do not know how it comes out. It is not simple, not that the complication comes from me, it is in what we are dealing with. It is because I was, as someone or other has said, confronted with the idea that Freud's unconscious supports, that I tried, not to answer for it, but to respond to it in a sensible way, namely, by not imagining that this avision – what Freud glimpsed, that's what that means – that this avision concerns something which is supposed to be inside each one, of each of those who make up a crowd and who believe that they are by this fact a unity.

This notion of crowd, which Massen-psychologie clearly means, has been translated as Psychologie collective et analyse du moi. There is nothing to be done with that. Freud may well have explicitly started from what Gustave Lebon specifically call psychologie des foules, it is translated by psychologie collective, a collection, a collection of pearls no doubt, each person being one of them, even though what is at stake, is to account for the existence, for the existence in this crowd of something which qualifies itself as ego.

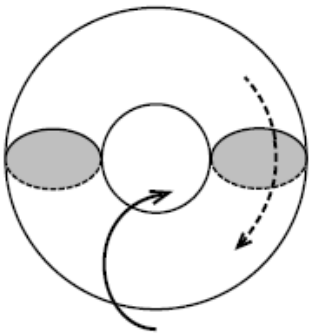
What can this ego be? It is in trying to explain this for you, that I tried to imagine this year the usage of what is called a topology. A topology, such as you can grasp simply by opening anything at all called General Topology, a topology is always founded on a torus, even if this torus is at times a Klein bottle, for a Klein bottle is a torus, a torus that crosses itself – I spoke about that a long time ago.

There you are. Here, you see that in this torus, there is something which represents an absolute inside when one is in the void, in the hollow that a torus may constitute. This torus can be a cord, no doubt, but a cord itself can twist, and there is something which can be drawn as being the inside of the cord. In this respect you have only to unpack what is enunciated as a knot in a special literature.

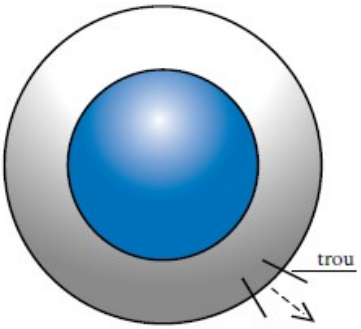
Fig. I-1



So then there are obviously two things, there are two kinds of holes; the hole which opens out onto what is called the outside, puts in question what is involved in space. Space seems to be extension when we are dealing with Descartes. But the body founds for us the idea of another kind of space. This torus in question does not immediately seem to be what is called a body, but you are going to see that it is enough to turn it inside out, not in the way that one turns a sphere inside out, because a torus is turned inside out in a quite different way. If here, for example, I set about imagining that it is a sphere which is inside another sphere, I do not get anything which resembles what I am going to try to get you sense now. If I make a hole in the other sphere, that sphere is going to come out like a small globular bell.

But it is a torus, it is a torus, namely, that is going to behave differently. [hole]

Fig. I-2



It would be enough for you to take a simple tube, the tube of a small tyre, and apply yourself to testing it, you will see then that the tyre lends itself to this way of swelling, as I might say, into the egress offered by the cut, the cut that we have made here, and which, if I were to continue, supposing that the cut comes here, comes to fold back here, to be inverted, as one might say, what you are going to get here is something which is different, different in appearance to the torus; for it is well and truly a torus all the same, even though, seen this time in section, it is well and truly a torus exactly as if we were to cut here the torus that is in question. I think that it will not escape you that by folding this back until we have completed the hole that we have made in the torus, it is well and truly the figure which follows that we will get. [cut]

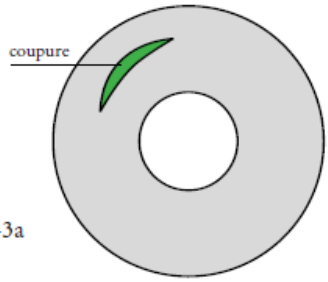


Fig. I-3a

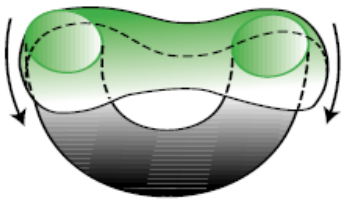

Fig. I-3b

This does not seem to command, as I might say, your consent. It is nevertheless quite tangible. It is enough to make an attempt at it.

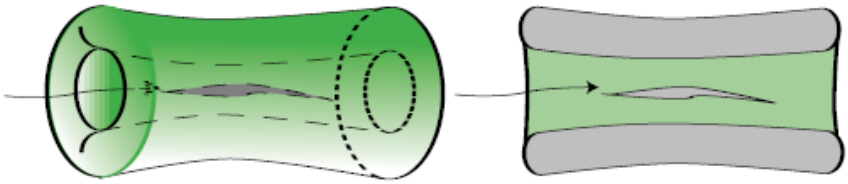

Fig. I-4

You have here 2 tori one of which represents what has happened, while the other is the original. If you, on one of these tori coupled in the same way – this is going to lead us to something else – on one of these coupled tori, you engage in the manipulation that I have explained for you here, namely, that you make a cut, you will obtain this something which is expressed as follows, namely, that these tori being coupled, you have inside one of these tori, another torus, a torus of the same kind as the one that I have drawn here. What this designates, is that here, you can clearly see that what regards the first torus has something that I called its inside, something in the torus has been turned inside out, which is exactly in continuity with what remains of the inside in this first torus. This torus is turned inside out in the sense that henceforth its inside is what goes to the outside, while in order to designate the latter as being the one around which there is turned inside out the one here, we see that the one that I designated here, has for its part remained unchanged, namely, that it has its first outside, its outside as it is posed in the loop, it has its outside always in the same place.

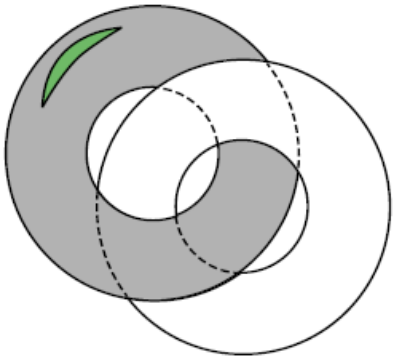

Fig. I-5a

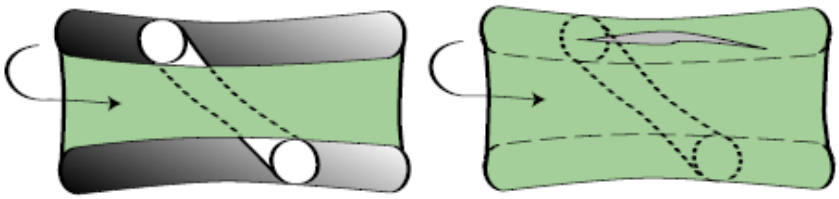

Fig. I-5b

There had therefore been a turning inside out of one of them. I think that, even though these things are very inconvenient, even very inhibiting to imagine, I think all the same that I have conveyed to you, conveyed what is at stake on this particular occasion. I mean that I have made myself understood, I hope, as regards what is at stake.

It is altogether remarkable that, what is here [Fig. I-4] does not – even though it is literally a torus – does not have the same shape, namely, that it presents itself as a rod [trique]. It is a rod which nonetheless remains for all that a torus. I mean that as you have already seen here, what has been formed, is something that has nothing to do with the first presentation, the one that knots the two tori [Fig. I-5a]. It is not the same sort of chain by reason of the turning inside out of what I call on this occasion the first torus. [cut]

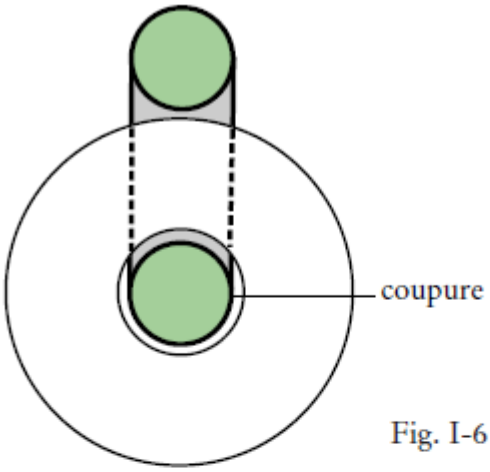

Fig. I-6

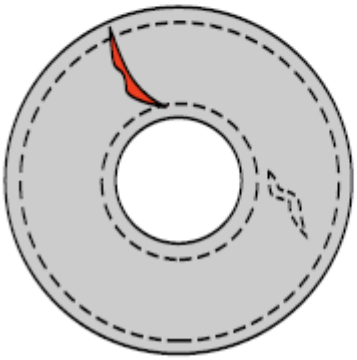

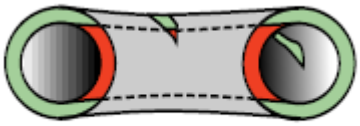

But as compared to this first torus, as compared to the same, what you have is something that I draw like that, with respect to the same, the torus-rod – if we remember this thing, the torus-rod comes here, namely, that in order to support things, the hole which is to be made in the torus, the one that I designated here, can be made in any locus whatsoever of the torus, up to and including cutting the torus here, because then it is quite manifest that this cut torus can be turned inside out in the same way and that it will be by joining two cuts that we will obtain this aspect. In other words by cutting the torus here, you get what I called the presentation as a rod in the same way, namely, that something that will manifest itself in the torus by two cuts will allow a folding over exactly in the way as by joining the two cuts – and not by forming the single cut, the one that I made here – it is in joining two cuts that we obtain this rod which I am calling by this term, even though it is a torus.

Here you have what today, and I agree it is not easy to digest, but what I would like the next time, namely, on the 2nd Tuesday of December what I would like to hear the next time from one of you, is the way in which these two modes of folding of the torus being joined to a third which for its part is the following:

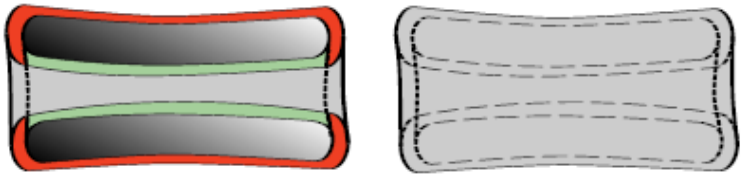

Fig. I-7b

Supposing that we have a torus in another torus, the same operation is conceivable for the 2 tori, namely, that from a cut made in this one and from a different distinct cut, since it is not the same torus, made in that one. It is in this case quite clear – I will leave you to conceive it – at the folding back of these two tori will give us the same rod, except for the fact that in the rod there will be an analogous content, except for the fact that for the two cases, this time, the inside will be outside and the same for this one; I mean for the torus which is inside.

How, I will ask you the question, how identify – because it is distinct – how identify hysterical identification, the so-called loving identification to the father and the identification that I would call neutral, the one which is neither one nor the other, which is the identification to a particular trait, to a trait that I called – that is how I translated the einziger Zug – that I called any trait whatsoever?

How divide up these three inversions of homogenous tori therefore in their practice, and what is more which maintain the symmetry, as I might say, between one torus and another, how divide them up, how designate in a homologous fashion paternal identification, hysterical identification, identification to a trait which is simply the same? There is the question on which I would like, that you would be good enough to engage with the next time.

Seminar 2: Wednesday 14 December 1976

No need for commentaries. Since the last time I spoke to you about something, like that, which is not one sphere in another one, which is what is called a torus, the result is – this is what I wanted to indicate to you by that, but it was allusive – that no result of science is a progress. Contrary to what is imagined, science goes round in circles, and we have no reason to think that the people who used flint-stone had any less science than us. Psychoanalysis notably is not a progress, since what I want to indicate to you, since after all I remain close to this subject, psychoanalysis notably is not a progress, it is a practical approach to feeling better. This feeling better, it must be said, does not rule out being brutalised...

Everything indicates, with the index of suspicion that I bring to bear on the all (tout), that in fact there is no whole (tout) that is not riddled and in bits and pieces. The only thing that counts, is whether a pièce (piece, coin) has or not an exchange value. It is the only definition of the whole. A pièce is valid in every circumstance, that means, that only means the qualified circumstance like every valuing, homogeneity of value. The whole is only a notion of value, the whole, is what is valid in its genus, what another of the same type of unit in its genus is worth.

We are advancing here very gently towards the contradiction of what I call the une bévue. The une bévue is what is exchanged despite the fact that it is not worth the unit in question. The une bévue is a false whole. Its type, as I might say, is the signifier, the typical signifier, namely, for example, there is nothing more typical than the same and the other. I mean that there is no more typical signifier than these two enunciations. Another unit is similar to the other. All that sustains the difference between the same and the other is that the same is the same materially. The notion of matter is fundamental by the fact that it founds the same. Anything that is not founded on matter is matériel-ne-ment [2] a fraud.

Fig. II-1

Material presents itself to us as corps-sistance[3], I mean under the subsistence of the body, namely, of what is *con*sistent, what holds together in the manner of what one can call a cunt (con), otherwise called a unit. There is nothing more unique than a signifier, but in this limited sense that it is only similar to another emission of signifier. It returns to value, to exchange. It signifies the whole, which means, it is the sign of the whole. The sign of the whole is the signified, which opens up the possibility of exchange. I underline on this occasion what I said about the possible, there will always be a time – that is what this means – when it will cease to write itself, where the signified will no longer hold up as founding the same value, material exchange. For the same value is the introduction of the lie, there is exchange, but not materiality itself.

What is the other as such? It is this materiality that I spoke about just now, namely, that I pinpointed as the sign mimicking the other. There is only a series of others, all the same qua unit, between which a bévue is always possible, namely, that it will not be perpetuated, that it will cease as a bévue. There you are. All of these are first truths, but I think I had to remind you of them.

[2] Condensing 'material' and 'does not lie'.
[3] Condensing 'body' and 'consistency'.

Man thinks. That does not mean that he is made only for that. But what is manifest, is that this is the only valid thing he does, because valid means – and nothing else, it is not a scale of values, a scale of values, as I remind you, turns round in circles – valid means nothing other than the fact that it involves the submission of use value to exchange value. What is patent, is that the notion of value is inherent to this system of the torus and the notion of something of an une-bévue in my title of this year only means that – one could just as well say the contrary – man knows more than he believes he knows. But the substance of this knowledge, the materiality which is beneath, is nothing other than the signifier in so far as it has meaning-effects. Man parle-être[4] as I said which means nothing other than that he speaks signifier, with which the notion of being is confused.

This is real. Real or true? Everything is posed, at this tentative level, as if the two words were synonyms. The appalling thing is that they are not everywhere so. The true is what one believes to be such; faith and even religious faith, is the true that has nothing to do with the real. Psychoanalysis, it must be clearly said turns round in the same circle. It is the modern form of faith, of religious faith. Adrift, that is where the true is when the real is what is at stake. All that because manifestly – since the time, we would have known it, if it were not manifest – manifestly there is no knowing (connaissance). There is only some kind of knowledge (savoir) in the sense that I said at the outset, namely, that we make mistakes...a bévue, that is what is at stake, philosophy going round in circles. It is a matter of substituting a different sense for the term world system that we must indeed preserve, even though as regards this world we can say nothing about man, except that he has fallen from it. We are going to see how, and that has a great deal of relationship with the central hole of the torus.

There is no progress, because there cannot be any. Man goes round in circles if what I say about his structure is true, because the structure, the structure of man is toric. Not at all that I affirm that it is so. I am saying that one can try to see the state of affairs, this all the more since general topology encourages us to do so. The world system up to now has always been spheroidal. Perhaps we might change! The world has always been painted, up to the present, like that, as regards what men have enunciated, has been painted inside a bubble. The living being considers himself as a ball, but with time he all the same realised that he was not a ball, a bubble. Why not recognise that he is organised, I mean what one sees of the living body, that he is organised at what I called the other day a rod.

[4] Condensing 'speaks' and 'being'.

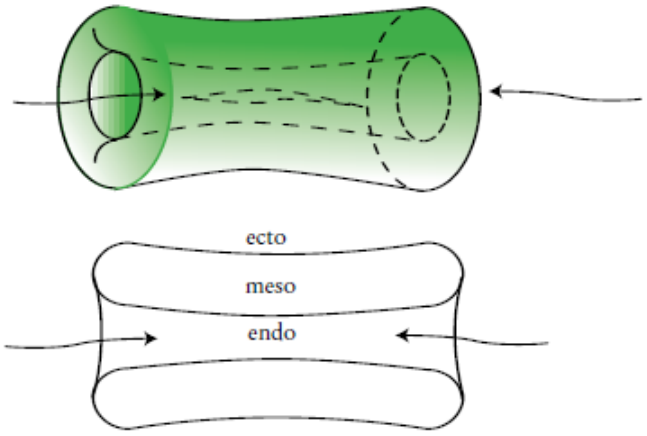
Fig. II-2



There you are, I am trying to draw it like that. It is obvious that this is how there ends up what we know about the body as consistent. This is called ecto, that endo and then around, there is meso. That is how it is made; here there is the mouth and here the contrary, the posterior mouth. Only this rod is nothing other than a torus. The fact that we are toric goes rather well in short with what I called the other day, rod (trique). It is an elision of the o: t()rique.

So then this leads us to consider that the hysteric whom everyone knows is just as well male as female, the hystorique[5] if I may allow myself this slippage, we must consider in short that she is – I am feminising it on this occasion, but as you are going to see I am going to put my weight on the other side, that will largely suffice to demonstrate to you that I do not think that there are only feminine hysterics – the hystorique in short has only an unconscious to make her consist, it is the radically other. She even is not except qua other. Well then, that's the case for me. I also, I only have an unconscious. That is even why I think about it all the time. It has got to the point that – I can bear witness to you of it – it has got to the point that I think the universe toric and that it means nothing else, the fact is that I only consist in an unconscious of which, of course, I think night and day, which means that the une-bévue becomes inexact. I make so few blunders that it is the same thing – naturally I make some from time to time, that is of little importance; I may happen to say in a restaurant 'Mademoiselle is reduced to eating only shrimps à la nage' [Mademoiselle en est réduit[6] a ne manger que des écrevisses à la nage'], as long as that is where we are at, making an error of this kind, does not matter. When all is said and done, I am a perfect hysteric, namely, symptomless except from time to time this error of gender of the kind in question.

[5] Condensing 'hysterique' and 'torique'

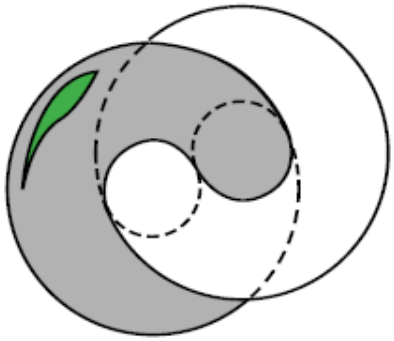
Fig. II-3



There is all the same, I would say, something that distinguishes the hysteric from me on this particular occasion. But I am going to try to present it to you. You can see how clumsy I am. There you are. That is two – I am colouring this one here to give the direction – that means a torus that links up with another one. Everyone knows, because I already indicated it the last time, that if you make a cut here and if you fold the torus you will obtain the following: something which is presented like that, namely, which reproduces what I called earlier the rod, except for the fact that what I drew earlier like that is there inside the rod. The difference between the hysteric

[6] Instead of the feminine 'réduite' and me, and I who, in short, by dint of having an unconscious unity with my unconscious, the difference is this, it is that, in short, a hysteric is sustained in her form as rod, is sustained by a framework. This framework is in short distinct from her consciousness. This framework is her love for her father. All that we know about the cases enunciated by Freud concerning the hysteric, whether it is Anna O., Emmy von N., or any other of them, the other von R., for example, the setting, is something that I designated earlier as a chain, a chain of generations.

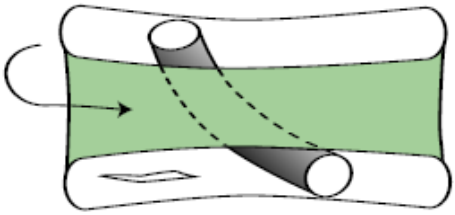

Fig. II-4a

It is quite clear that from the moment that one is engaged along this path, there is no reason why it should stop, namely, that here there can be something else that constitutes a chain and that it is a question of seeing – this cannot go very far – of seeing how this on occasion will constitute a rod with respect to love, the love of the father in question.

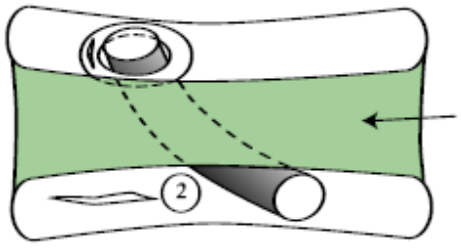

Fig. II-4b

That does not mean that it is settled and that one can here schematise the turning inside out of this torus around torus 2, let us call it that, that one can schematise it by a rod. There is perhaps something which creates an obstacle, and very specifically that's what it's all about; the fact that the unconscious chain stops at kinship relationships is yes or no founded, relationship of the child to his kin.

If I pose the question: 'What is a hole?', you have to trust me, this has a certain relationship to the question. A hole like that, of feeling, that is what this means when I crack the surface. By this I mean that by intuition, our hole is a hole in the surface. But a surface has a front and a back, as is well known, and that signifies therefore that a hole, is the hole in the front, plus the hole in the back. But since there exists a Moebius strip, which has the property of conjoining the front which is here with the back which is there, is the Moebius strip a hole?

It is obvious that it really seems to be so. Here there is a hole, but is it a true hole?

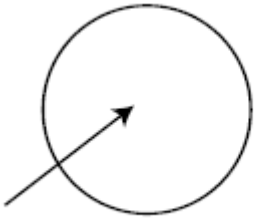

Fig. II-5

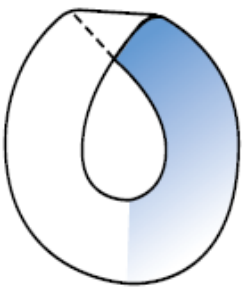
It is not at all clear, for a single reason, as I already pointed out, that a Moebius strip is nothing other than a cut, and that it is easy to see that, if this is defined as a front, it is a cut between a front and a back. Because it is enough for you to consider this figure, it is quite easy to see that if here is the front, a back is there, since it is the back of this front and that, here, the cut is between a front and a back, thanks to which, in the Moebius strip, if we cut it in two, the front and the back as I might say become normal again namely, that when a Moebius strip cut in two, we are going to go over it, it is easy to imagine what is found, namely, that from the moment that there are two turns, there will be a front distinct from the back.

Fig. II-6a



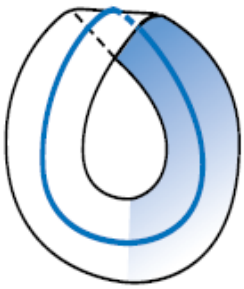


Fig. II-6b

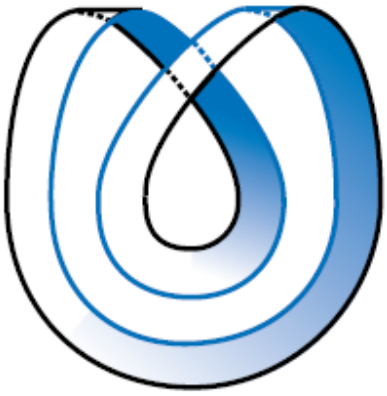

Fig. II-7

This indeed is why a Moebius strip is essentially capable of redoubling itself; and what must be remarked, is the fact that it redoubles itself in the following way which allows the passage. It is a real pity that I did not take precautions. Here is the Moebius strip as it redoubles itself, as it redoubles itself and shows itself to be compatible with a torus. This indeed is why I am attached to considering the torus as being capable of being cut out in terms of a Moebius strip. And it is enough, it is enough for this – here is the torus – it is enough for there to be cut out in it not a Moebius strip, but a double Moebius strip. It is very precisely what is going to give us an image of what is involved in the link between the conscious and the unconscious. The conscious and the unconscious communicate and are both supported by a toric world this is the reason, this is the discovery, a discovery which was made by chance, not that Freud did not work desperately hard at it, but he did not say the last word on it. He specifically never enunciated the following, which is that the world is toric. He believed, as every notion of the psyche implies, that there was something that I earlier dismissed by saying a loop, and another loop around the first, this one being in the middle, he believed that there was a vigilance, a vigilance that he called the psyche, a vigilance which reflected the cosmos point by point. In this he was aware of what is considered as a common truth, which is that the psyche is the reflection of a certain world.

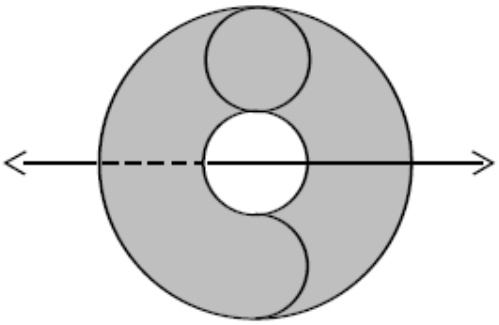

Fig. II-8

That I am enunciating this in terms, I repeat, of something tentative, because I do not see why I would be any more sure about what I am putting forward, even though there are many elements which give the feeling of it, and specifically from the outset what I put forward about the structure of the body, of the body considered as what I called a rod.

That the living being, every living being, is denominated as rod, is something that a certain number of studies, moreover crudely anatomical, have always seen themselves confirm. That the torus should be something which is presented as having two holes around which something consists, is something that is simply obvious. I repeat, it was not necessary to construct a lot of specifically microscopic apparatuses, it is something that has always been known, since simply people began to dissect, began to do the most macroscopic anatomy.

That one can cut the torus in such a way that it becomes a double turn Moebius strip is certainly to be noted. In a certain way, the torus in question is itself a hole and in a certain way represents the body. But that this should be confirmed by the fact that this Moebius strip which I already chose to express the fact that the conjunction of a front and a back is something which symbolises rather well the union of the unconscious and the conscious, is something which is worthwhile remembering.

Can we consider a sphere as a hole in space? This is obviously very suspect. It is very suspect because this pre-supposes, it pre-supposes something that is not self-evident, the plunging into space. It is equally true for the torus, and that is why it is by dividing the torus into two sheets, if I can express myself in that way, into two sheets capable of making a double turn, that we rediscover the surface, namely, something that to our eyes is more assured, is more assured in any case to found what is involved in a hole.

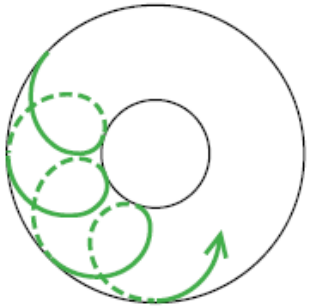

Fig. II-9

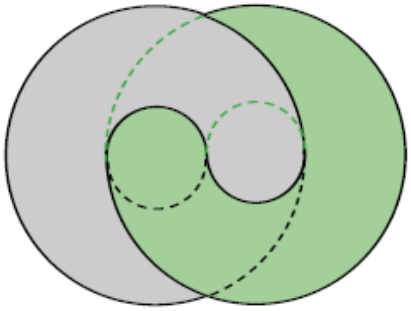

Fig. II-10

It is clear that it is not today or yesterday that I made use of these concatenations. Already to symbolise the circuit, the cutting of desire and demand, I made use of this, namely, of the torus. I had distinguished two modes of it, namely, what went around the torus, and on the other hand what went around the central hole. In this respect the identification of the demand to what is presented like this, and of desire to what is presented like that, was altogether significant.

There is something that I pointed out the last time, namely, this, which consists in a torus, within a torus. If you mark these two tori, the two of them, by a cut, by folding them back, by folding back the two cuts, if I can express myself in that way, concentrically, you will make what is inside come to the outside, and inversely, what is outside will come inside. It is very precisely why I am struck by the fact that the highlighting, as envelopment, of what is inside is something that is not without relevance to psychoanalysis.

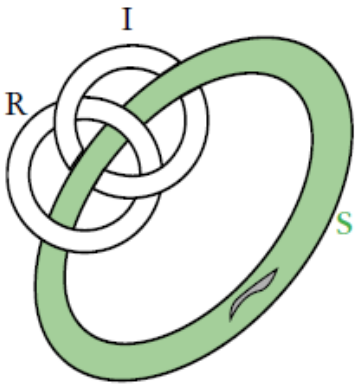

Fig. II-11

That psychoanalysis is attached to putting outside what is inside, namely, the unconscious, is something which obviously has its price, has its price, but is not without posing some questions. Because if we suppose that there are three tori, to call things by their name, that there are three tori that are specifically the Real, the Imaginary and the Symbolic, what are we going to see by turning inside out, as I might say, the Symbolic?

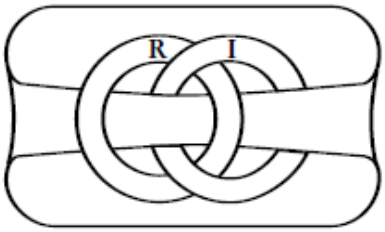

Fig. II-12

Everyone knows that this is how things will present themselves and that the Symbolic seen from the outside as torus, will find itself, with respect to the Imaginary and the Real, will find itself having to pass above this one which is above and below this one which is below. But what do we see by proceeding as we usually do by a cut, by a split to turn the Symbolic inside out? This Symbolic turned inside out in this way,...here is what the Symbolic turned inside out in this way will give: it will give a completely different arrangement of what I called the Borromean knot, namely, that the Symbolic will totally envelop, by turning the symbolic torus inside out, will totally envelop the Imaginary and the Real. This indeed is why the use of the cut with respect to what is involved in the Symbolic presents something which risks in short, at the end of a psychoanalysis, of provoking something which might be specified as a preference given above all to the unconscious. I mean that, if things are such that things are going a bit better like that as regards the life of each one, namely, to put the accent on this function, this function of the knowledge of the une-bévue by which I translated the unconscious, things can effectively be better organised. But it is all the same a structure of an essentially different nature to the one that I qualified as Borromean knot. The fact that the Imaginary and the Real should be entirely included, in short, in something which has come from the practice of psychoanalysis itself, is something which gives rise to a question. There is here, all the same, a problem. I repeat, this is linked to the fact that it is not when all is said and done the same thing, the structure of the Borromean knot and what you will see there. Someone who has experienced a psychoanalysis is something which marks a passage, which marks a passage, – of course this presupposes that my analysis of the unconscious qua founding the function of the Symbolic is completely acceptable. It is nevertheless a fact, the fact is apparently, and I can confirm it, apparently the fact of having gone through an analysis is something which cannot be in any case restored to the previous state, except of course by carrying out another cut, one that would be equivalent to a counter-psychoanalysis. This indeed is why Freud insisted that psychoanalysts at least should undertake what is usually called two tranches, namely, to carry out a second time the cut that I designate here as being what restores the Borromean knot in its original form.

Fig. II-13

Seminar 3: Wednesday 21 December 1976

I am delighted that because of the holidays you are less numerous, at least I was delighted, I was delighted ahead of time. But I should tell you that today....

If in a systematic cutting up of a torus, a cutting up which has the result of producing a double Moebius strip, this cutting up is present here. The torus is there and to signify it, to distinguish it from the double loop, I am going with the same colour as the torus in question, draw for you a little ring (1) which has the effect of designating what is inside the torus and what is outside. [interchange 1&2]

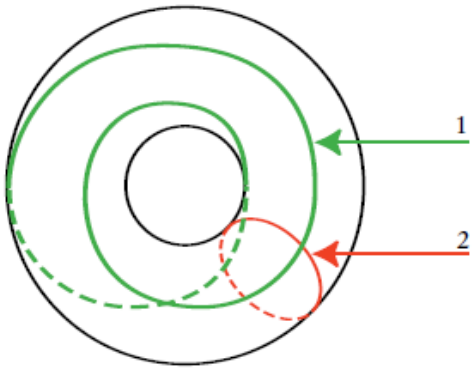

Fig. III-1a

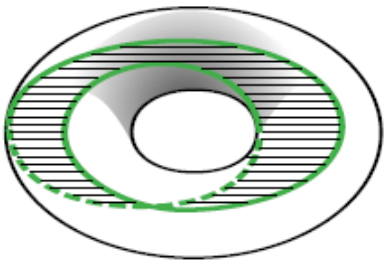
If we cut out something of such a kind that here, if we were to cut the torus according to something (2) which, as I told you, has the result of furnishing a double Moebius strip, we can only do so by thinking of what is inside the torus – what is inside the torus by reason of the cut that we make on it - as conjoining the two cuts in such a way that the ideal plane which joins these two cuts should be a Moebius strip.

Fig. III-1b



You see that here I cut doubly through the green line, I cut the torus. If we join these two cuts with the help of a stretched plane, we get a Moebius strip. That indeed is why that is here (1) and on the other hand what is here (2) constitutes a double Moebius strip. I say double, what does that mean? That means a Moebius strip which is redoubled; and a Moebius strip which is redoubled has as property – as I already showed you the last time – has as property, not of being two Moebius strips, but being a single Moebius strip which looks like this, - let us try to do better – which looks in this way like the result of the double cut of the torus. [double Moebius strip and Moebius strip]

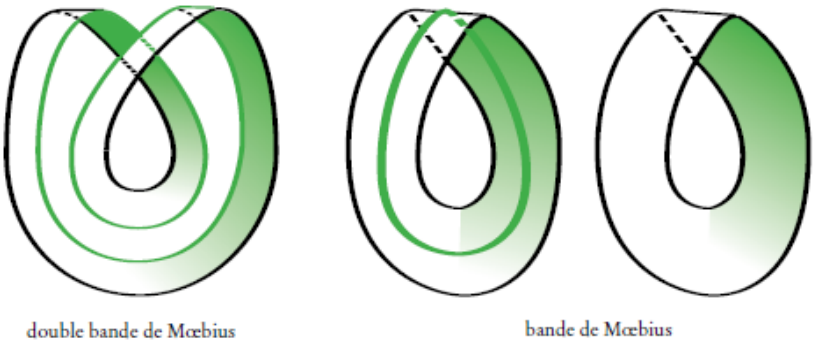


Fig. III-2

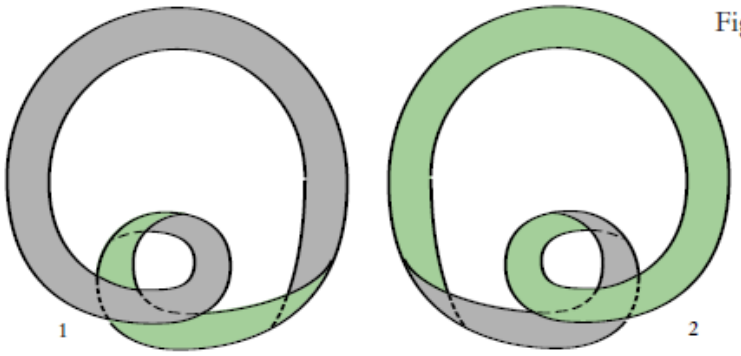

Fig. III-3

The question is the following: is this double Moebius strip in this shape or that one. In other words, does it go – I am speaking about one of the loops – does it pass in front of the following loop, or does it pass behind? It is something which is obviously not unimportant from the moment that we proceed to this double cut, a double cut which has the result of determining this double Moebius strip.

I drew this figure very badly for you. Thanks to Gloria, I am going to try to draw it better: here is how it ought to be drawn. I do not know if you see it altogether clearly, but it is certain that the Moebius strip is redoubled in the way you see here. This is the point at which I am not really very satisfied about what I am in the process of showing you. I mean, since I spent the night cogitating on this business of the torus, I cannot say that what I am giving you here is very satisfying.

What appears as a result of what I called this double Moebius strip which I am asking you to put to the test, a test which you can experiment with in a simple way, with the simple condition of taking two sheets of paper and drawing on them a capital S, something like the following.

Fig. III-4

Be careful because this capital S demands to be drawn first with a small curve and then with a big curve. Just here the small curve and afterwards the big curve. If you cut out two of them on a sheet of double paper, you will see that by folding the two things that you will have cut onto a single sheet of paper, you will naturally obtain a junction of the number 1 sheet of paper with the number 2 sheet of paper, and of the number 2 sheet of paper with the number 1 sheet of paper, namely, that you will have what I designated just now as a double Moebius strip. You can easily note that this double Moebius strip is cut – if I can express myself in this way – indifferently. I mean that what here is above, then passes beneath, then subsequently having passed beneath repasses above. It is a matter of indifference to make pass what first of all passed above, one can make it pass below. You will note easily that this double Moebius strip functions in either case.

Does that mean that here it is the same thing, I mean that from the same point of view one can put what is below above and inversely? This indeed is in effect what the double Moebius strip realises. I apologise for adventuring into something which was not without some trouble for me, but it is certain that that is the way it is. If you work at producing in the same way as I presented this double Moebius strip to you, namely, by folding two pages, two pages thus cut out in such a way that the one is going to be conjoined to the second page and that inversely the second page is going to be conjoined to page 1, you will have exactly this result, this result about which you can note that one can make pass indifferently the one as I might say in front of the other, page 1 in front of page 2, and inversely page 2 in front of page 1.

What is the suspension which results from this highlighting, this highlighting of the fact that in the double Moebius strip what is in front from the same point of view can pass behind from the point of view which remains the same. This leads us to something which, I am encouraging you to it, is of the order of know-how, a know-how which is demonstrative in this sense that it does not happen without the possibility of an une-bévue. For this possibility to be extinguished, it has to cease to be written, namely, that we should find a way, and in this case a dominant way, a way of distinguishing the two cases.

What is the way of distinguishing these two cases?

This interests us because the une-bévue is something which substitutes for what is founded as knowledge that one knows, the principle of knowledge that one knows without knowing it (sans le savoir). The 'le' here is brought to bear on something, the 'le' is a pronoun on this particular occasion which refers to knowledge itself qua, not as knowledge, but what to do about knowing. This indeed is why the unconscious lends itself to what I thought I should suspend under the title of the une-bévue.

The inside and the outside in this particular case, namely, as regards the torus, are they notions of structure or of form? Everything depends on the conception that one has of space and I would say up to a certain point of what we highlight as the truth of space. There is certainly a truth of space which is that of the body. In this case, the body is something which can only be founded on the truth of space, which indeed is where the sort of asymmetry that I highlight has its foundations. This asymmetry depends on the fact that I designated as the same point of view. And this indeed is why what I wanted to introduce this year is something which is important for me. There is the same asymmetry not simply concerning the body, but concerning what I designated in terms of the Symbolic. There is an asymmetry of the signifier and of the signified which remains enigmatic. The question that I would like to advance this year is exactly the following: is the asymmetry of the signifier and of the signified of the same nature as that of the container and the contained which is all the same something which has its function for the body?

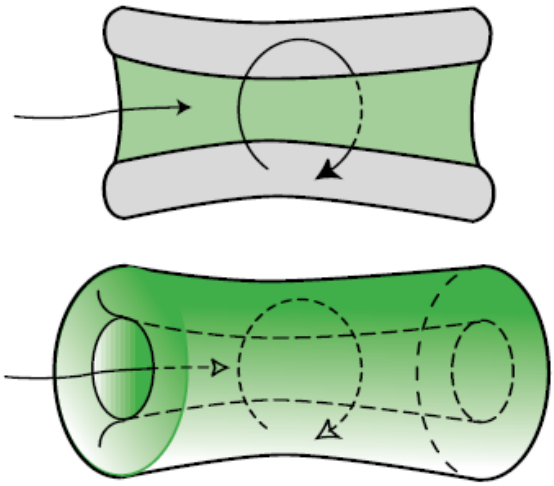

Fig. III-5

Fig. III-6a

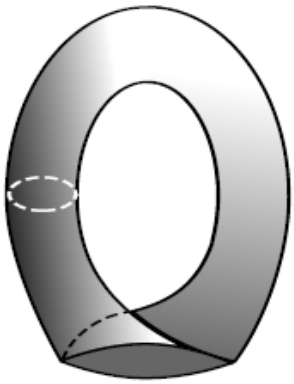

Fig. III-6b

The distinction between the shape and the structure is important here. It is not for nothing that I marked here something which is a torus, is a torus even though its shape does not allow this to appear. Is the shape something which lends itself to suggestion? Here is the question that I am posing, and that I pose while advancing the primacy of the structure.

Here it is difficult for me not to put forward the fact that the Klein bottle, this old Klein bottle that I made so much of, if I remember correctly, in the Four fundamental concepts of psychoanalysis, this old Klein bottle has in reality that shape there. It is strictly nothing other than this, except for the fact that for it to become a bottle we correct it in this way (in red), namely that we have made it come back in the following shape, that we have made it come back in such a way that we no longer comprehend anything about its essential nature. Is there not effectively, in the fact of calling it a bottle, is there not here a falsification, a falsification with respect to the fact that only its presentation here in green is the something that precisely allows it to be immediately grasped the way in which the junction of the front is made with the back, namely everything that is cut out in this surface, on condition of making it complete, and that is again a question: what is meant by making a cut which involves the whole of the surface?

These are the questions that I ask myself and that I hope to be able to resolve this year, I mean that this brings us to something fundamental as regards the structure of the body, or more exactly of the body considered as structure. That the body is able to present all sorts of aspects which are of pure shape, that just now I made dependent on suggestion, this is what is important for me. The difference of the shape, of the shape insofar as it is always more or less suggested with the structure, that is what I would like this year to highlight for you.

You must excuse me. This, I must say, is assuredly not the best thing that I could have brought to you this morning. I had, as you see, I had the great worry, I am floundering, - there is a case for saying, it is not the first time - I am floundering in what I have to put forward to you and that is why I am leaving to give you the opportunity to have someone who will be this morning a better orator than I, I mean Alain Didier who is here present, and whom I invite to come to tell you what he has drawn from certain data of mine, which are the drawings of writing and which he would really like to share with you.

- Alain Didier: Good. I must say first of all that Dr Lacan is taking me completely by surprise, that I was not warned that he proposed to give me the floor to try to take up again a point about which I spoke to him these days, of which I should tell you right away that personally I am not making any articulation whatsoever with what we are being told at present. I sense it confusedly perhaps, but it is not....do not expect therefore me to articulate what I am going to say with the problems in topology about which Dr Lacan is talking at the moment. The problem that I was trying to articulate, is to try to articulate in a rather consequential way with what Dr Lacan contributed about the montage of the drive, to try starting from the problem of the circuit of the drive, different torsions which appear to me can be located between the subject and the Other, different moments in which two or three torsions are articulated.

For me this remains a little hypothetical, but anyway I am going to try to retrace for you how things can like that be put in place. So then the drive, the instinctual circuit from which I will start, in order to try to advance, will be something rather enigmatic, will be something of the order of the invocatory drive and its reversal into a listening drive. I mean that the word listening drive, does not, I believe, exist does not exist anywhere as such, it remains altogether problematic. And more precisely when I spoke about these ideas to Dr Lacan, I should say that it is more specifically on the subject of the problem of music and of trying to locate, to locate for a listener who listens to some music that touches him, let us say that has an effect on him, to locate the different moments because I am going to try therefore to convey to you now rather succinctly because I did not prepare a text, nor notes? So then excuse me if it's a little improvised.

I imagine, if you wish, that, if you listen to some music, I am talking about a music that speaks to you or that 'musics' you, I start from the idea that, if you listen, the way in which you take this music, I will start from the idea that from the outset it is as an auditor that you function; that appears obvious, but in fact it is not so simple. Namely, that I would say that if the music, at the very first moment – the moments that I am going to try to decorticate for the convenience of the presentation are not of course to be taken as chronological moments, but as moment which might be logical, and that I necessarily disarticulate them for the convenience of the presentation – if therefore music has an effect on you as a listener, I think one can say that it is because somewhere, as a listener, it is just as if it gave you an answer. Now the problem begins with the fact that this answer therefore gives rise in you the antecedents of a questions which dwelt in you as Other, qua Other, qua listener who dwells in you without you knowing it; you discover therefore that there is here a subject somewhere which appears to have heard a question that is in you and which, would not only have heard it, but has been inspired by it, since music, the production of the 'musicing' subject, if you wish, would be the answer to this question that is supposed to dwell in you. Therefore you already see that if one wished to articulate that to the desire of the Other: if there is in me, qua other, a desire, an unconscious lack, I have the testimony that the subject which receives this lack is not paralysed by it, it is not fading because of it, underneath, like the subject which is under the injunction of the che vuoi, but on the contrary is inspired by it and its inspiration, the music bears witness to it. Good, this is the starting point of what is to be noted.

The other point is to consider that qua Other, I do not know what this lack which dwells in me is, but that the subject itself tells me nothing about this lack since this lack does not mean anything directly. The subject itself of this lack knows nothing and says nothing about it because he is said by this lack, but qua Other I would say that I am in a topological perspective where there appears to me the point where the subject is divided since he is said by this lack, namely, that this lack which dwells in me, I discover that it is its very own, it itself knows nothing about what it is saying, but I know that it knows without knowing it. I am going therefore...You see that what I have said to you there could be written a little bit like what Lacan articulates about the process of separation. I am therefore going to articulate the different moments of the drive with the different articulations of separation. Good.

On the bottom left, I put the process of separation with an arrow which goes from the Ø (O with this lack put together between the capital O and the subject, the little o-object, and this arrow is meant to signify that, I know nothing about this lack qua Other, but something of it comes back to me from the subject who for its part says something about it. That is why I articulate it with a drive, because it is just as if I wanted to manage to articulate this lack, this nothing, hang something on it, know something about it, let us say I trust the subject: I allow myself to be pushed by it – it is moreover the drive. I allow myself to be pushed by it and I expect that it will give me this little o-object. But according as I advance, as I wait for this subject, as I might say, what I discover is that in following the subject, the little o, all the two of us are doing is going around it. It is effectively inside the loop and I assure myself that effectively this little o is unattainable.

I could say here that this is a first circuit and that, I have assured myself qua Other that he has effectively this character of lost objects, the idea that I propose, is that one can comprehend at that moment the instinctual reversal of which Freud speaks and Lacan takes up again, the instinctual reversal that

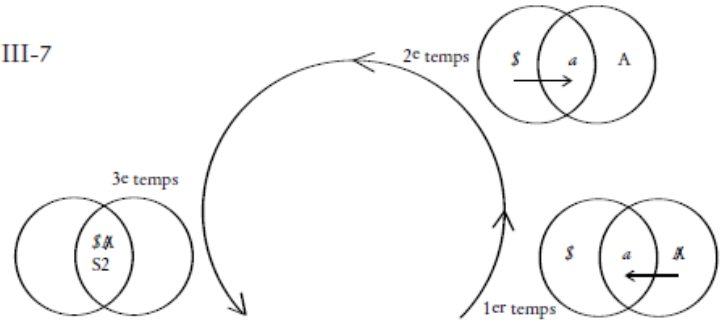
Fig. III-7



I am going to put on the top of the graph, as the passage to a second mode of separation and this instinctual reversal, as one might say, as a second attempt at approaching the lost object but this time from a different perspective: from the perspective of the subject. Let me explain: if you wish, in the first moment that I postulate, I would say that while I recognise myself as listener, the switching point that comes, which means that now I am going to pass to the other side, can be articulated as follows, namely, to advance that when I recognise myself as listener, one could say that this time it is me, I am recognised as listener by the music which comes to me, namely, that the music, what was an answer and which gave rise to a question in me, things are inverted, namely, that the music becomes a question which assigns me, as subject, to respond myself to this question, namely, that you see that the music is constituted as listening to me, as subject finally – let us call it by its name – as subject supposed to hear and the music, the production, that which was the inaugural answer becomes the question, the production therefore of the musician subject being constituted as subject supposed to hear, assigns me in this position of subject and I am going to answer it by a transference love. In this way one cannot fail to articulate the fact that music produces all the time effectively love-effects, as one might say.

I come back again to this notion of lost object from the following angle: the fact is that you have not failed to remark that what is proper to the effect of music on you, is that it has this power, as one might say, of metamorphosis, of transmutation, that one could summarise rapidly as follows, by saying for example that it transmutes the sadness that is in you into nostalgia, I mean by that that if you are sad, the fact is that you can designate, whether you are sad or depressed, you can designate the object that you lack, whose lack you are missing, makes you suffer, and it is sad to be sad, I mean, it is not the source of any enjoyment. The paradox of nostalgia – as Victor Hugo said, nostalgia is the happiness of being sad – the paradox of nostalgia is that precisely in nostalgia what happens, is that what you are lacking is of a nature that you cannot designate and that you love this lack. You see that in this transmutation, everything happens as if the object which was lacking really evaporated, has evaporated, and that what I propose to you, is to comprehend effectively the enjoyment, one of the articulations of musical enjoyment, as having the power to evaporate the object. I see that the word 'evaporate', we can almost take it in the physical sense of the term, in which physics has located sublimation: sublimation, is effectively a matter of making a solid pass into the state of vapour, of gas; and sublimation, is this paradoxical path by which Freud teaches us – and Lacan has articulated in a much more sustained way – it is precisely the path along which we can have access, precisely along the path of desexualisation, to enjoyment.

Therefore, you see, in this second moment – what I am marking, at the top of the circuit: the reversal of the drive – a first torsion – it is perhaps starting from this notion of torsion that Dr Lacan thought of inserting this little topo at the point that he is in his progress – a second moment therefore, a first torsion appears where there is the apparition of a new subject and of a new object. The new subject precisely, is me who from auditor becomes, I would say, I cannot say speaker, speaking, musicing, one would have to say that it is the point in music where, the notes that go through you, everything happens as if paradoxically, it is not so much that you hear them, it is as if everything happens as if – I insist on the 'if' – everything happens as if you were producing them yourself: you are the author of this music. I put here an arrow which goes there from the subject to the separating little o, wanting to indicate by that that in this second perspective of separation, this time, it is from the point of view of the subject that I have a perspective of a lack in the Other.

So then what is this lack?

How map it out with respect to transference love? Well then, when we listen to music that moves us, the first impression is hearing all the time that this music has always something to do with love; one might say that music sings with love. But if one takes this little schema seriously and if even one tries to comprehend how love functions, from this movement of torsion in music, you will sense it is not so much the subject, the subject who speaks of his love for the Other, but much more rather that he answers the Other, that his message is this answer where he is assigned by this subject supposed to hear and that his music of impossible love is in fact an answer that he makes to the Other and that it is to the Other that he supposes the fact of loving him and of loving him with an impossible love. The problem, if you wish, one could in a summary way draw a parallel with certain mystical positions, where the mystic is the one who does not tell you that he loves the Other, but that he only answers the Other who loves him, that he is put into this position, that he has no choice, that he only answers it.

In this second moment of the music, one can draw this parallel in the measure that the subject effectively solicits the love of the Other for him, but the love of the Other qua radically impossible. That is why I put this arrow, the fact is that the subject has, through this second point of view, has a perspective on the lack that inhabits the Other, namely, that as you see, after these two moments, one could say that there is confirmed by this second moment that the evaporated object, in the second position, remains just as evaporated as in the first position. We are getting closer, as you see, we are getting closer to the end of the loop. Transference, one may remark, corresponds very precisely to the way in which Lacan introduced transference love in the seminar on Transference, namely, that there is there: the subject postulates that it is the Other who loves him; he poses therefore a beloved and a lover. There is therefore a passage, in this transference love, from the beloved to the lover. What I have told you there, in any case is not correct, because the second moment cannot be articulated as such, it is synchronically articulated with a third moment which exists, I would say, synchronically with it in the following way: the subject, this time, if you wish, being himself a musician, being therefore a producer of the music, addresses himself to a new other, which I called the subject supposed to hear who is no longer altogether the Other at the starting point, it is a new other. This new other, precisely, is no longer the 'vel' it is no longer 'either one or the other'. To this new other, he is also going to identify himself, namely, that there is starting from the top of the loop, a double arrangement where the subject is both the one who is speaking and the one who is hearing.

Something may perhaps illustrate this division for you: this is what is highlighted, in my opinion, by the myth of Ulysses and the Sirens. You know that Ulysses, in order to hear the song of the Sirens, had stuffed with wax the ears of his sailors. How ought we understand that? Ulysses exposes himself to hearing, to hearing the invocatory drive, in fact to hearing the song of the Sirens; but what he is exposed to, since, when he hears the song of the Sirens, you know that history tells us that he shouts to the sailors, that he says to them: 'Stop, let us stay here'. But he has taken his precautions: he knows that he will not be heard. Namely, that this myth in my opinion illustrates, this is my second moment, namely, that Ulysses is put in the position of being able to hear in the measure that he had assured himself that he could not speak, namely when he had assured himself that there would not be this reversal of the drive, namely, the second and the third moments, namely, when he had assured himself that there would not be a subject supposed to hear, because of these wax stoppers. You see that the first moment, 'to hear' is one thing, but that even poses for us the problem of the ethics of the analyst. Is the analyst precisely not someone from whom one can hear that he hears certain things, is he not, at a given moment, necessarily, by the very structure of the instinctual circuit, in a position of having to make himself a speaker? Not to behave like Ulysses, let us say, who had already taken a first risk of hearing certain things.

I imagine that after this second and third moment where the subject and the Other continue their paths side by side always separated by the separating small o, what is the position with respect to our starting point, where have we got to? Well then, the point, one could say, on to which the subject emerges, is that after this second and third moment, he has found the assurance that this little separating o, he has found the assurance that it was effectively impossible to encounter it, since he only managed to go around it, but he had needed to make several dialectical movements in order to have, I would say, like – I don't know if this is the right word – to have as it were a kind of certainty that is going perhaps to allow him to make a new leap, which will be my fourth moment, a new leap that is going to allow him at that moment to pass to a new kind of enjoyment, to risk himself in it. I said 's'y risquer' because it is not obvious that one will arrive at what I am calling this fourth moment that I will all the same mark. I am telling you that one can imagine a last moment which would be the terminal point, the point not of return, since the drive does not come back to the starting point, but the ultimate, possible point of the drive, I marked the enjoyment of the Other, and the little schema, the new schema of separation, the third that I am inscribing, represents the schema of separation, no longer with the little o-object in the lunula, but with the signifier S(Ø), and the signifier S_2, a signifier that Lacan teaches us to situate as being that of the Urverdrängung.

Why am I marking that? I would say that, the whole journey having been made, that it is from the point of view of the subject, of the Other and of second other, it is confirmed that the object is really volatilised; one may imagine that at this moment the subject is going to make a leap, is no longer going to be content to be separated from the Other by the little o-object but is going to veritably proceed to an attempt to go through the phantasy; there is a passage in seminar II, well before Lacan speaks about the problem of the enjoyment of the Other, where Lacan on the subject of the drive and of sublimation, asks the question, he asks himself how the drive is experienced after the phantasy has been gone through. And Lacan adds: 'It is no longer of the domain of analysis, but is the beyond of analysis'. Now if we recall that the little o-object is not uniquely, as one so often hears it said, essentially characterised by the fact that it is the missing object, it is certainly the missing object, but its function of being the missing object is specified very particularly, let us say, in the phenomenon of anxiety but besides this function, one could say that its fundamental function is much more rather to fill in this radical gap which renders so imperious the necessity of demand. If there is really something lacking in this speaking being, it is not the little o-object, it is this gap in the Other which is articulated with the S of Ø. That is why at the end of this instinctual circuit, to account for the experience of the listener, I am putting forward the idea the nature of the enjoyment to which one can accede at the end of the journey is not at all on the side of a 'surplus enjoying', but precisely on the side of this experience of this enjoyment, that perhaps one might call 'ecstatic', enjoyment of existence itself – moreover as regards the term 'ecstatic enjoyment' I was struck at finding Levi-Strauss writing on the one hand, in a number of Musique en jeu where Levi-Strauss puts very precisely in perspective the nature, not of the enjoyment, in fact the experience of music and that which appears to him to be that of mystical experience. Freud himself, in a letter to Romain Rolland, finds himself answering, spontaneously articulating that he refused himself musical enjoyment and that this musical enjoyment appeared to him as strange as what Romain Rolland was saying to him about enjoyments of a mystical order; anyway it is he himself who articulated the two, who had the idea of introducing music into it.

Final moment then, where the subject will make the leap, I don't know whether one can say 'beyond' or 'behind' the little o-object, but will manage to break through and arrive at this locus, one might say of the commemoration of the unconscious being as such, namely, the joining up of the most radical lacks which are those which constitute the gap of the subject of the unconscious and that of the unconscious, namely, to put the experience of this..., one might say that in the final moment, if you wish, one might say that the real as impossible is a white heat, is raised to incandescence; at that very moment, I mean, I would indicate, for my part, that the drive stops in the sense that musicians, listeners to music know that in certain moments of being overwhelmed by music, as one says, time stops. Effectively there is a suspension of time at that level. And in this suspension of time, one can make the hypothesis that what is happening, is a sort of commemoration of the founding act of the unconscious in the most primordial separation, the most primordial gap that has been torn from the real and which has been introduced into the subject, which is that of the S of Ø of the signifier. I believe that the last point that one can put forward, is to remark that this point of enjoyment which appears to me to be what Lacan articulates as being the enjoyment of the Other, is precisely the point of maximum desexualisation, I would say total, superior, sublime, sublime in the sense of sublimation; and it is indeed at this point that sublimation is connected with desexualisation and enjoyment.

So then, two torsions or three torsions therefore, of which I spoke to you at the start, it is therefore these which can be mapped out between the passage from the first to the second moment, from the second to the third, and I do not know whether one can really speak about torsion for the topology of what I would call the fourth moment. This remains to be thought through.

- J Lacan: Thank you very much.

Seminar 4: Wednesday 11 January 1977

What determines the contagious nature of certain formulae? I do not think that it is the conviction with which they are pronounced, because one cannot say that that is the basis on which I propagated my teaching. Anyway in that regard, it is rather J.A. Miller who can contribute a testimony on this: does he consider that what I have been chatting about throughout my 25 years of seminar carries that brand?

Good. This all the more so in that what I strove for was to say what is true, but I did not say it with all that much conviction, it seems to me. I was all the same sufficiently sidelined to be well-behaved. To say what is true about what? About knowledge. It was from this that I believed I could found psychoanalysis, because when all is said and done everything that I said holds together. To say what is true about knowledge, is not necessarily to ascribe knowledge to the psychoanalyst. As you know, I defined the transference in these terms, but that does not mean that it is not an illusion. It remains that, as I said somewhere in this yoke that I re-read myself with some astonishment – what I recounted in the good old days always strikes me, I never imagine that it is I who could have said it - that Knowledge and Truth do not have with one another, as I say in this Radiophonie in No 2-3 of Scilicet, that Knowledge and Truth have no relation with one another. I now must produce a preface for the Italian translation of these four first numbers of Scilicet.

That naturally is not all that easy for me, given the age of these texts. I am certainly weakish in my way of taking on the responsibility of what I myself wrote. That is not because it always appears to me to be the most uninspired stuff, but it is always a little backhanded and that is what astonishes me.

The Knowledge in question therefore, is the unconscious. Some time ago, invited to something that was nothing less than what we are trying to do at Vincennes under the name of Psychoanalytic clinic, I remarked that the Knowledge in question was neither more nor less than the unconscious and that in short it was very difficult to know clearly the idea Freud had of it. Everything he says, it seems to me, it seemed to me, prescribed that it should be a Knowledge.

Let us try to define what this can mean to us, a Knowledge. What is at stake, in Knowledge, is what we can call signifier-effects (effets de signifiant).

I have here a yoke that I must say terrorised me. It is a collection which has come out under the title of La philosophie en effet. Philosophy in effect, in signifier-effects, it is precisely what I am trying to get out of unscathed, I mean that I do not believe that I am doing philosophy, but one always does more of it than one believes, there is nothing more slippery than this domain; you also do it, you too have your moments, and it is certainly not what you have most to rejoice about.

Freud therefore had only a few ideas about what the unconscious was. But it seems to me, in reading him, that one can deduce that he thought it was signifier-effects. Man – we have to call a certain generality by that name, a generality in which one cannot say that some stand out; Freud had nothing transcendent about him: he was a little doctor who did, good God, what he could in terms of what we call curing, which does not take us very far – man therefore, since I spoke about man, man can scarcely escape this business of Knowledge. This is dictated to him by what I called the signifier-effects, and he is not at ease: he does not know how to 'deal with' ('faire avec') Knowledge. This is what is called his mental debility from which, I must say, I do not except myself. I do not except myself simply because I have to deal with the same material, with the same material as everyone else and that this material, is what dwells in us. With this material, he does not know how 'to deal' ('y faire'). It is the same thing as this 'dealing with' that I spoke about just now, but these nuances of the tongue are very important. This y faire cannot be said in every language. Knowing how to deal with is something different to know-how. It means to get on with it. But this 'y faire'indicates that one does not really capture the thing, in short, in a concept.

This leads us to pushing the door of certain philosophies. You must not push this door too quickly, because you must remain at the level where I placed what in short I called the discourses; the saids, it is the 'saying which succours' ('dire qui secourt'). We must all the same take advantage of what the tongue in which we speak offers us in terms of equivocation. What succours, is it the saying or is it the said? In the analytic hypothesis, it is the saying; it is the saying, namely the enunciating, the enunciating of what I called earlier the Truth. And in these 'dire-secours', I had, the year when I spoke about L'envers de la psychoanalyse – you certainly do not remember it – I had, like that, distinguished in general 4 of them, because I was amusing myself precisely at making a sequence of 4 revolve, and in this sequence of 4, the Truth, the Truth of the saying, the Truth was only in short implied, since as perhaps you remember...yes, as you perhaps remember, it was presented like that, I mean that it was the discourse of the master that was the least true discourse. [impossibility]

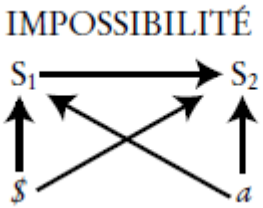

Fig. IV-1

The least true, that means the most impossible. I noted in effect the impossibility of this discourse, at least this was the way in which I reproduced it in what was published of Radiophonie.

This discourse is lying and it is precisely by that that it reaches the Real. Verdrängung, was what Freud called that; and nevertheless, it is indeed a said which succours him. Everything that is said is a swindle. It is not simply about what is said starting from the unconscious. What is said starting from the unconscious, participates in equivocation, in equivocation which is the principle of the witticism: the equivalence of sound and sense, it was in the name of that that I believed I could advance that the unconscious was structured like a language.

I noticed, like that a little bit too late and in connection with something which appeared in Lexique et Grammaire or else Langue Française, a trimestrial journal; it is a little article that I would advise you to look at very closely because it is by someone for whom I have great esteem, he is J.–C. Milner. It is No 30, which appeared in May 1976. It is called Réflexions sur la réference. Something that, after reading this article, is an object of interrogation for me is the following; it is the role that he gives to the anaphore. He notices that grammar plays a certain role and that specifically the sentence that is not so simple: 'I saw 10 lions and you, he says, you saw 15 of them (tu en a vu 15)', the anaphore involves the use of this 'en'. It very precisely highlights things by saying that the 'en' does not concern the lions, it concerns the 10. I would prefer that he should not say 'tu en a vu 15'; I would prefer him to say 'tu en a vu plus'. Because, in truth, the tu in question has not counted these 15. But it is certain that in the distinct sentence: 'I captured 10 lions and you, tu en a capturé 15', the reference is no longer to the 10 but to the lions. It is, I believe, quite gripping that in what I call the structure of the unconscious, grammar must be eliminated. Logic must not be eliminated, but grammar must be eliminated. In French there is too much grammar. In German there is still more. In English, there is a different one that is in a way implicit. Grammar must be implicit to have its proper weight.

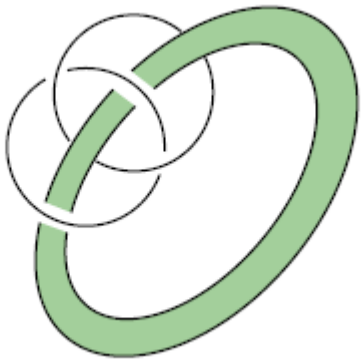
I would like to indicate to you something which is from a time when French did not have such a burden of grammar. I would like to point you towards something called Les bigarrures du seigneur des Accords ('The variegations of the lord of concords'). He lived right at the end of the 16th century. It is gripping because he seems to be all the time playing on the unconscious, which is all the same curious, given that he had no kind of idea of it, even less than Freud, but it is all the same on it that he plays. How manage to grasp, to say, this sort of flux that usage is?
And how state precisely the way in which, in this flux, the unconscious, which is always individual, can be specified?

There is something striking, which is that there are not three dimensions in language. Language is always flattened out. And that indeed is why my twisted business of the Imaginary, the Symbolic and the Real, with the fact that the Symbolic is what goes above what is above and which passes beneath what is beneath, this indeed is what gives it its value. The value is that it is flattened out.

Fig. IV-2



It is flattened out, and in a way that you know, because I repeated, resifted it, you know the value of the function, namely, that the effect this has is that if one of the 3 dissolves, the 2 others are freed. This is what I described, at one time, by the term knot for something that is not a knot, but effectively a chain. This chain all the same, it is striking that it can be flattened out.

And I would say that – it is a reflection, like that, which was inspired in me by the fact that as regards the Real, people want to identify it to matter (la matière) – I would rather propose to write it like this 'l'âme à tiers'[7] (third party soul?). It would be, like that, a more serious way of referring oneself to this something that we have to deal with, and it is not for nothing that it is homogenous to the two others; that someone named Charles - Sanders as he was called, as you know, I already wrote this name often, many, many times, - that this Peirce was really struck by the fact that language does not properly speaking express relation, that indeed is something which is striking; that language does not permit a notation like x having a certain type of relation with y, and no other; this indeed is what authorises me, since Peirce himself articulates that for this there would need to be a ternary logic, and not the one we use, a binary logic, this indeed is what authorises me to speak about l'âme à tiers' as something which necessitates a certain type of logical relationships.

Yes. Well then, all the same, I am going in effect to come to this Philosophie en effet, a collection published by Aubier-Flammarion, to say what scared me a little in what makes its way in short from something that I inaugurated by my discourse. There is a book which has appeared by someone called Nicolas Abraham and someone called Maria Torok. It is called Cryptonymie, which sufficiently indicates the equivocation, namely that the name is hidden there, and it is called Le verbier de l'homme aux loups. I don't know, there are perhaps some people here who attended my elucubrations on the Wolfman. It was in this connection that I spoke about the foreclosure of the name of the father. Le verbier de l'homme aux loups is something where, if words have a sense, I believe I recognise the thrust of what I have always articulated, namely, that the signifier is what is involved in the unconscious, and that, the fact that the unconscious, is that in short one speaks – if indeed there is something of the parlêtre – that one speaks all alone, that one speaks all alone, because one never says anything but one and the same thing which in short is upsetting, hence its defence and everything that is elucubrated about so-called resistances. It is altogether striking that resistance – I have said it – is something which takes its starting point in the analyst himself and that the goodwill of the analyser never encounters anything worse than the resistance of the analyst.

[7] Pun on la matière.

Psychoanalysis, - I have said it, I repeated it quite recently, - is not a science. It does not have its status as science and it can only wait for it, hope for it. But it is a delusion from which one is awaiting a science to be brought forth. It is a delusion that one is waiting to bring forth a science. One can wait for a long time. One can wait for a long time, I said why, simply because there is no progress and that what one is expecting is not necessarily what one is going to get. It is a scientific delusion therefore, and one is expecting that it will bring forth a science but that does not mean that analytic practice will ever bring forth this science.

It is a science that has all the less chance of maturing in that it is antinomical; and all the same, by the use that we make of it, we know that it has its relationships between science and logic. There is a thing which, I should say, astonishes me astonishes me still more than the broadcasting, the broadcasting which I know well is happening, the broadcasting of what is called my teaching, my ideas – because that means that I have ideas – the broadcasting of my teaching to this which makes its way under the name of Institut de Psychanalyse, the thing that astonishes me still more, is not that Le verbier de l'homme aux loups, not simply that it sails ahead, but that it produces offspring, the fact is that someone whom I did not know – to tell the truth, I think he is in analysis – whom I did not know was in analysis – but this is a simple hypothesis – someone called Jacques Derrida who writes a preface for this v*erbier*. He writes an absolutely fervent enthusiastic preface in which I believe I can see a trembling which is linked – I do not know which of these two analysts he has dealings with – what is certain, is that he couples them; I do not find, I must say, despite the fact that I launched things along this path, I do not find this book, nor this preface to have the right tone. As a kind of delusion, I am speaking to you like that, I cannot say that it is in the hope that you will go and look at it; I would even prefer you to forgo it, but anyway I know well that when all is said and done you are going to rush to Aubier-Flammarion, even if only to see what I call an extreme limit. It is certain that this is combined with the more and more mediocre desire I have of talking to you. What is combined, is that I am scared of that which in short I feel myself more or less responsible for, namely, to have opened the floodgates of something about which I could just as well have shut up. I could just as well have reserved for myself alone the satisfaction of playing on the unconscious without explaining the farce of it, without saying that it is by this yoke of the signifier-effects that it operates. I could just as well have kept it to myself, since in short if I had not really been forced, I would never have done any teaching. It cannot be said that what Jacques Alain Miller published about the split of '53, that it was with any enthusiasm that I took up the baton on the subject of this unconscious.

I would even say more, I do not like the second topography all that much, I mean the one into which Freud let himself be drawn by Groddeck. Of course one cannot do otherwise, these flattening-outs, the Id with the big eye which is the Ego. The Id is..., everything is flattened out. But anyway, this Ego – which moreover in German is not called Ego, is called Ich - Wo Es war – where it was, where it was: we have no idea about what was in Groddeck's head to support this Id, this Es. He thought that the Id in question was what lived you. This is what he says when he writes his Buch, his 'Book of the Id', his book on the Es, he says that it is what lives you.

This idea of a global unit which lives you, even though it is quite obvious that the Id dialogues, and this is even what I designated by the name of capital O, the fact is that there is something else, what I called earlier l'âme à tiers, l'âme à tiers which is not simply the Real, which is something with which explicitly, I am saying, we do not have relations. With language we clamour after this thing, and what is meant by S(Ø), that is what that means, which is that it does not answer. It is for that reason that we talk all alone, that we talk all alone until there emerges what is called an Ego, namely, something as regards which nothing guarantees that it might not properly speaking be speaking deliriously. This indeed is the reason I highlight, like Freud moreover, that you do not have to look too closely at what is called psychoanalysis and that, between madness and mental debility, we can only choose. That's enough of that for today.

Seminar 5: Wednesday 18 January 1977

Fig. V-1

This is rather laboured, so there you are, in truth, here, it is more or less the testimony, the testimony of a failure, namely, that I have exhausted myself for 48 hours, in making what I would call, contrary to what is involved in a plait (tresse), I exhausted myself for 48 hours, in making what I would call a 'four-stranded plait' ('quatresse'). There you are [Fig. V-2]

Fig. V-2

The plait is at the principle of the Borromean knot. That is to say that after six times, one finds, provided one crosses these three threads in an appropriate fashion – good, so then, this means that at the end of six manoeuvres of the plait, you find in order, at the sixth manoeuvre, the 1, the 2 and the 3. This is what constitutes the Borromean knot [fig. V-3]. If you have, if you try it twelve times, you have likewise another Borromean knot, which Borromean knot is curiously not visualised immediately [Fig. V-4]. It has nevertheless this character that contrary to the first Borromean knot which, as you have seen just now, passes above the one that is underneath, since as you see, the red is above the green, underneath the one that is underneath: that is the principle from which the Borromean knot derives. It is in function of this operation that the Borromean knot holds up. Likewise, in a fourfold operation, you will put one above, the other underneath, and in the same way you will operate with underneath the one that is underneath, you will therefore have a new Borromean knot which represents the one with 12 crossovers.

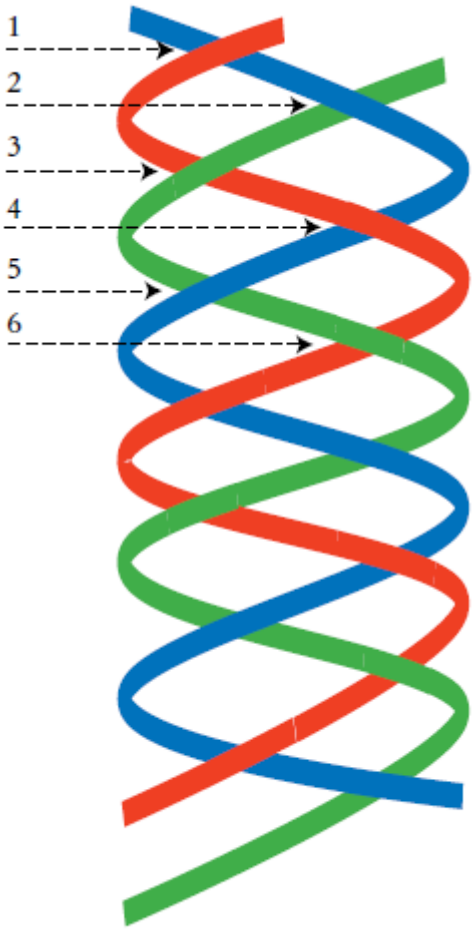

Fig. V-3

What is to be thought of this plait?

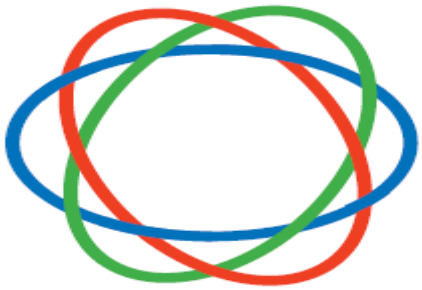

Fig. V-4

This plait can be in space. There is no reason, in any case at the level of the 'fourfold' ('quatre-se') that we cannot suppose it to be entirely suspended. The plait nevertheless can be visualised insofar as it is flattened out. I spent another period, one that was supposedly reserved for holidays, exhausting myself in the same way, in trying to make function another type of Borromean knot, namely, one that would be obligatorily made in space, since what I started from was not the circle as you see it here, namely, something that one usually flattens out, but from what is called a tetrahedron.

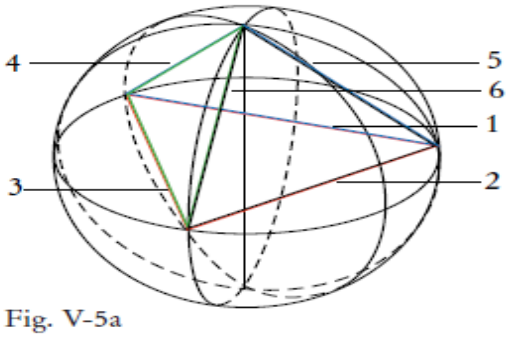

Fig. V-5a

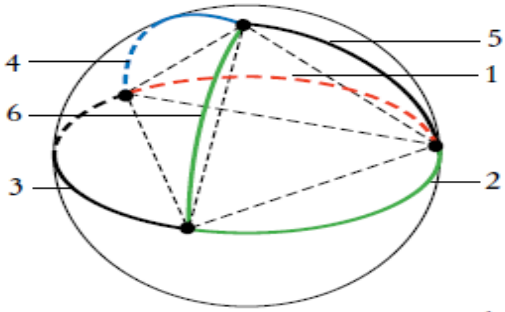

Fig. V-5b

A tetrahedron is drawn like that. Thanks to that, there are 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6 edges (arêtes). I should say that the prejudices that I had – because it is a matter of nothing less – pushed me to operate with the four faces, and not with the six edges, and with the four faces it is quite difficult, it is impossible to make a plait. There must be six edges there to make a correct plaiting and I would like to see these balls carrying the outline of the schema, coming back [balls thrown into the audience]. The fact is that you will note there that the plaiting, not six-fold but twelve-fold, is altogether fundamental. I mean that, what happens is that one cannot bring into play this knotting of tetrahedrons without starting, since there are only three tetrahedrons, without starting from the plait. It was a fact that was unveiled to me rather late, and which you will see here provided I pass you these balls which, I repeat, I would like to see coming back, because I have not, far from it, fully elucidated them,. I am going therefore, as I usually do, to throw them to you so that you can examine them.

I would like all four of them to be sent back. In effect, they are not similar. There are four of them, and there is a reason for that. It is a reason that I still have not mastered. It is preferable, even though of course that would take too much time, it would be preferable, that these balls should be compared one to the other, for they are effectively different. I would like that, from this threefold plait which is basic in the operation of these tetrahedric Borromean knots to which, I repeat, I applied myself without really completely managing them, I would like you to draw a conclusion. The fact is that, even for the tetrahedrons in question, one proceeds also to what I would call a flattening out for this to be clear. The flattening out which on this occasion is spherical is necessary for one to put one's finger on the fact, as I might say, that the crossovers in question, the tetrahedric crossovers, are indeed of the same order, namely, that the tetrahedron which is underneath, the third tetrahedron, passes underneath, and that the tetrahedron which is above, the third tetrahedron passes above. It is indeed because of that that we are still here dealing with the Borromean knot.

What is annoying nevertheless, is that even in space, even starting from a presupposed spatial, we should also be constrained in this case here to support – since when all is said and done, it is we who support it – to support the flattening out. Even starting from a spatial presupposition, we are forced to support this flattening out, very precisely in the form of something which presents itself as a sphere (Fig. V-5b). But what does that mean, if not, that even when we manipulate space, we have never seen anything but surfaces, surfaces no doubt which are not banal surfaces because we articulate them as flattened out. From that moment on, it is manifest on the balls that the fundamental plait, the one that crisscrosses itself 12 times, it is manifest that this fundamental plait forms part of a torus. Exactly this torus that we can materialise by the following, namely, the twelve-fold plait, and that we can also moreover materialise in terms of the following namely, the six-fold plait [Fig. V-3 and Fig. V-4].

In truth this function of torus is clearly manifest in the balls that I have just given you, because it is no less true that between the two little triangles, if we make – I would ask you to consider these balls – if we make a polar thread pass through, we will have exactly in the same way a torus; for it is enough to make one hole at the level of these two little triangles to constitute at the same time a torus. This indeed is why the situation is homogenous, in the case of the Borromean knot, as I have drawn it here, is homogenous between the Borromean knot and the tetrahedron.

There is therefore something which ensures that it is no less true for a tetrahedron that the function of the torus governs here whatever is nodal in the Borromean knot. It is a fact, and it is a fact that has strictly never been glimpsed, namely, that everything that concerns the Borromean knot is only articulated by being toric.

A torus is characterised quite specifically as being one hole. What is annoying, is that this hole is difficult to define. The fact is that the knot of the hole with its flattening out is essential, it is the only principle of their counting – and that there is only one way, up to the present, in mathematics, of counting the holes: it is by going through, namely, by taking a path such that the holes are counted. This is what is called the fundamental group. This indeed is why mathematics does not fully master what is at stake.

How many holes are there in a Borromean knot? This indeed is what is problematic since, as you see, flattened out, there are four of them [Fig. V-6]. There are four of them, namely, that there are not fewer than in the tetrahedron which has four faces in each of the faces of which one can make a hole. Except for the fact that one can make two holes, even three, even four, by making a hole in each of these faces and that, in this case, each face being combined with all the others and even repassing through itself, it is hard to see how to count these paths which would be constitutive of what is called the fundamental group. We are therefore reduced to the constancy of each of these holes which, by this very fact, vanishes in a quite tangible way, since a hole is no great thing.

Fig. V-6

How then distinguish what makes a hole and what does not make a hole? Perhaps the quatresse can help us to grasp it.

What is involved in this quatresse is something which solidarises what is found, that by which it happens that I qualified three circles, namely, that, as you see here in this first drawing [Fig. V-1], these three circles form a Borromean knot. They form a Borromean knot, not that the first three form a Borromean knot since, as is implicated in the fact that the freed fourth, as I might say, the fourth element freed should leave each of the three free. The quatresse binds nevertheless, starting from the one which is the highest (black), on condition of passing above the one that is highest, it will find itself by passing over the one which in the flattening out is intermediary (green), by passing beneath, it will find itself binding the three. This indeed in effect is what we see happening [Fig. V-7], namely, that, on condition that you see that as equivalent to the following, I think that you see here that it is a matter of a representation of the Real insofar as it is here that we have the apprehension of the Imaginary, of the Symptom and of the Symbolic, the Symbolic on this particular occasion being very precisely what we must think about as being the signifier. What does that mean? The fact is that the signifier on this particular occasion is a symptom, a body, namely, the Imaginary being distinct from the signified. This way of making the chain questions us about the following: the fact is that the Real, namely, what on this particular occasion is marked here, the fact is that the Real would be very specially suspended on the body.

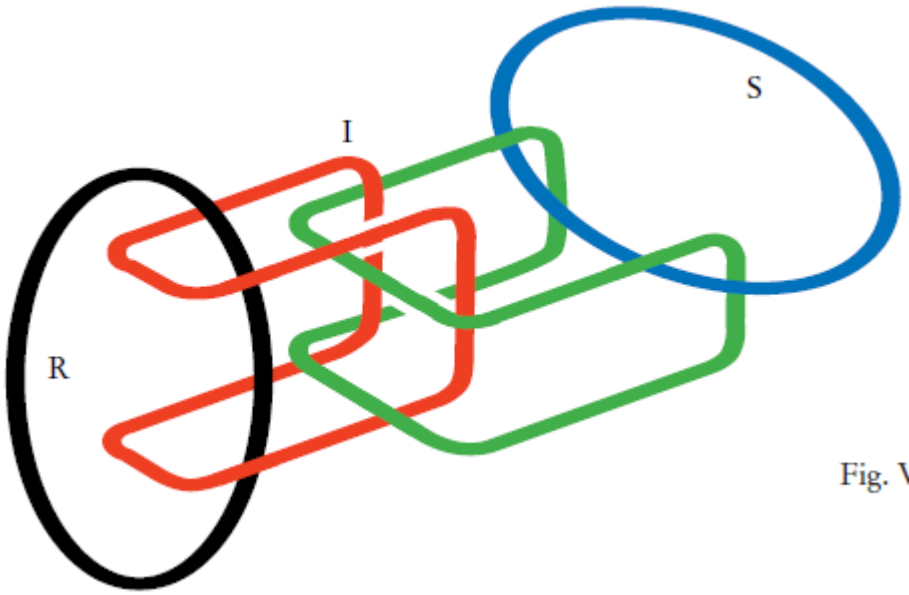

Fig. V-7

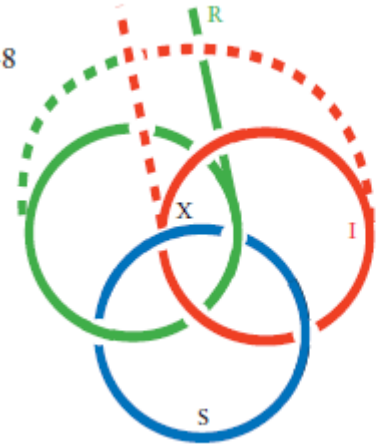
Let's see. Let us try to see here what would result from that, namely, that this X which is at this place, would open out and that the Imaginary would continue into the Real. This indeed in effect is what happens, because bodies are only produced, in the most futile fashion, as appendices of life, in other words of that about which Freud was speculating when he speaks about a germen.

We find there around the speaking function, something which, as one might say, isolates man, of whom at this time it must be marked that it is only in function of the fact that there is no sexual relationship, that what we can call on this particular occasion language, as I might say, may supply for it. It is a fact that blah-de-blah furnishes, furnishes what is distinguished by the fact that there is no relationship.

Fig. V-8



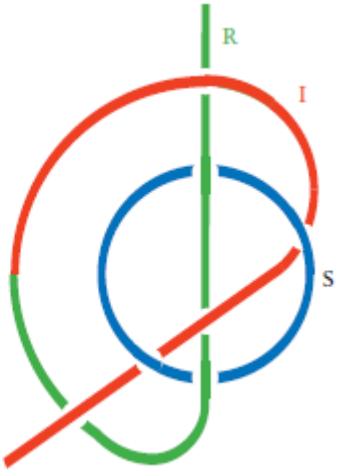


Fig. V-9

Yes, it would be necessary in this case that the Real, without us being able to know where it stops, that we should place the Real in continuity with the Imaginary. In other words, it begins there somewhere right in the middle of the Symbolic. That would explain why the Imaginary, traced out here in red, effectively falls back into the Symbolic, but that it is on the other hand foreign to it, as is testified by the fact that it is only man who speaks. You see here that the Real is drawn in green.

Yes, I would like someone to challenge me about what today, for you, I laboriously tried to formulate in this very unsymbolic fashion; it is something that is not easy to express. I think that as regards what is involved in this four-fold plait [Fig. V-2], it seems to me to reproduce, to reproduce very exactly what is here [Fig. V-1], namely, that it is a way of representing it as plait that is in question. If I did not succeed effectively from the start, it is because it must not be believed that it is easy to make a four-fold plait; one must start from a point which sections the intercrossings, as I might say, in an appropriate fashion and it may be that things are such that starting from one of these points, one does not find a means of making the plait.

It is at this that I delayed so long, delayed so long that there has resulted more than a little damage to what I had to say to you today. If therefore someone wants to answer me, namely, question me about what i wanted to say today I would be very grateful.

- X: I would like to ask you a question...I wanted to ask you, because you said 'the presupposed space', and I never too clearly understood - and I humbly admit it before this noble assembly – whether you were saying 'ek-siste' or 'existe'. I have a right to my little weaknesses. But why could you not say: the 'père espace'?
- Lacan: Yes
- X: I am asking myself, and then you said the 'presupposed tetrahedron which is threefold in space forms a plait'. I am not at a circus, but I remember since we are talking about a sphere, with these balls that you threw out which are so different, one could plait it.
- Lacan: One could?
- X: One could plait on the Borromean isle. One could make the plait in space like a jungler.
- Lacan: Yeah...
- X: It is because you said that it is difficult when it's flattened out, you admitted it yourself. Nobody told you that?
- Lacan: Yes, yes that's true. Well then has anyone else a question to ask?
- Y: Does the opening of the Real and of the Imaginary with the Symbolic folded back on itself presuppose that you are passing from the domain of man to the domain of life and of living beings?
- Lacan: He is certainly not the only one alive.

- X: You can't hear me because precisely I don't have a microphone. Things are designed technically so that there should be microphones. Why don't you use one? Is it to give a greater value to what you're saying?
- Lacan: Certainly not. I apologise for having had to go to the board more than once.
- X: So then, if the speaking function isolates man, what about a preverbal manifestation, namely, of the possible opening up of the Real – I am re-reading: the Real in continuity with the Imaginary – how do you see for example preverbal manifestations like all those of art for example:
- Lacan: Those of...
- X: Art, music, indeed all the arts which are, which do not go by way of the talking cure that do not pass through speaking? So then if you put the Real in continuity with the Imaginary by an opening here, I believe, from the experience which I have of painting that the continuity here drawn by you on the board by an opening is in act – I am saying indeed in act – this time by the body, which is as you have defined it and as Freud defined it by the germen, like the body being here an appendix, I think that at the level of painting something happens which is a preverbal appendix operation, namely, and there, I would ask you to link up precisely not that I do not know what follows but I am waiting for your riposte.
- Lacan: Yes
- X: I see in this graph, which is the representation of a cut, but where there is a possibility of an opening, in the act which is the act of painting, which is precisely there the fact of an opening, but by a continuity which would be, excuse me, like when you take a piece of toffee, it makes threads; so then this time there is no cut between the subject and the locus of the Other, there is not this alienation that was described for us in music, the last time, where the small o vanishes, let us say between the subject and the locus of the Other that makes threads. It is like when one is making toffee. Starting from the compulsionality of the Subject to the locus of the Other, me, for my part i see a curious possibility from the language of painting, which is mine, and which is a language where at the level of what is denoted, namely, at the level of what is in the dictionary and of what is plunged into an abyss and which is in function of time in your study on language starting from the treatment. Here in the pictorial fact there is a sort of insistence and since Lacan says that sense does not consist in what it signifies at that very moment, effectively there is always this slippage and this interplay of signifiers as in the Seminar on the Purloined Letter, here there would seem to be a process of continuity, of curious insistence, a first level which would be a level of denotation, which might exist in poetry, which exists in what concerns me, in a pictorial experience where at that moment there is a first putting into a scenario or a production; signs are scenoengraphed and are going to insist at a level where the primary passes into the secondary and if you wish, constitutes a first formation of signs which themselves will be afterwards put into the condition of an abyss by the operation of a sort of scenic engagement.

- Lacan: For my part I believe that your preverbal on this particular occasion is completely modelled by the verbal. I would even say that it is hyper-verbal. What you call on this particular occasion filaments, is something which is profoundly motivated by the symbol and by the signifier.

- X: Yes, moreover I believe that too. But let us say that the path is different and does not happen by the whole process of the Symbolic and this is not at all to put in doubt or to fault your teaching even though I am not for it here.

- Lacan: There is no reason why one cannot find fault with my teaching.

- X: No but let us say at the level of what no longer is.

- Lacan: I am trying to say that art on this particular occasion goes beyond symbolism. Art is a know-how and the Symbolic is a principle of doing. I think that there is, that there is more truth in the saying of art than in any amount of blah-de-blah. That does not mean that it can pass along any path whatsoever.

- X: Yes I just wanted to say that things...

- Lacan: It is not a preverbal. It is verbal to the power of two. There you are.

Seminar 6: Wednesday 8 February 1977

Ah! I am banging my head against what I would call, on this occasion, a wall, a wall of course of my own invention. That is precisely what annoys me. One does not invent just anything at all. And what I invented is designed in short to explain – I say to explain, but I am not very clear about what that means – to explain Freud. What is striking, is that, in Freud, there is no trace of that worry or more exactly of these worries, of these worries that I have and that I communicate to you in any case in the form of: 'I am banging my head against the walls'. That does not mean that Freud did not worry a lot, but what he gave to the public was apparently of the order, I say of the order of a philosophy namely, that there was not..., I was going to say that there were no snags (d'os); but precisely, there were bones and what is necessary for walking on one's own, namely, a skeleton. There you are. I think that here you recognise the figure, in any case if I drew it properly, the figure, the figure in which by a single stroke depicted the generation of the Real, and that this Real is extended in short by the imaginary since that indeed is what is at stake, without us knowing very clearly where the Real and the Imaginary stop. There you are, it is this figure [Fig. VI-1] which is transformed into this figure there [Fig. VI-2]. I am only offering it to you because in short it is the first drawing where I haven't got into a muddle, which is remarkable, because I always of course get into a muddle.

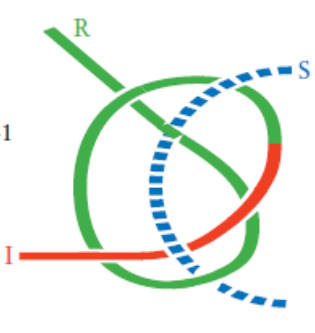

Fig. VI-1

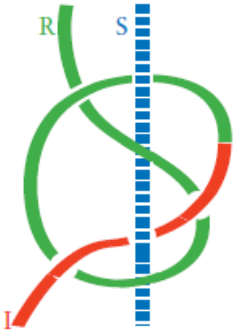

Fig. VI-2

Good, I would like all the same to give the floor to someone whom I asked to come here to express a certain number of things which seem to me to be worthy, altogether worthy of being enunciated. In other words I think that Alain Didier Weil is someone who is not badly engaged in his business. What I can tell you, is that, for me, I was very attached to flattening out something. Flattening out always participates in a system, it simply participates in it, which is not saying a lot. A flattening out, for example that I made for you with the Borromean knot, is a system. I am trying of course to crush this Borromean knot, and this indeed is what you see in these two images.

The ideal, the Ego Ideal, in short would mean finishing with the Symbolic, in other words saying nothing. What is this demoniacal force which pushes forward to say something, in other words to teach, is what I have come to tell is that, the Superego. That is what Freud designated by the Superego which, of course, has nothing to do with any condition that could be designated as natural. On the subject of this natural, I ought all the same signal something to you, it is that I found myself strongly drawn to read something which appeared in the Royal Society of London and which is an 'Essay on dew'. This had the greatest esteem of someone called Herschel who wrote something entitled 'Discours préliminaire sur l'étude de la philosophie naturelle'. What most strikes me in this 'Essay on dew', is that it is of no interest. I obtained it, of course, at the Bibliothèque Nationale where I have like that from time to time a particular person who makes an effort for me, a person who is a musicologist there and who is in short not too badly placed to obtain for me on occasion, since I had no other means of getting this original text which at a pinch I might have managed to read. What I asked her for was a translation. It had been translated in effect, this'Essay on dew', this 'Essay on dew' had been translated from its author William Charles Wells, it was translated by someone called Tordeux, a master in pharmacy and you really have to force yourself enormously to find it of the slightest interest. That proves that not all natural phenomena interest us as much, and dew quite particularly, we slip over the surface of that. It is all the same curious that dew, for example, has not the same interest that Descartes succeeded in giving to the rainbow. Dew is as natural a phenomenon as the rainbow. Why does it not have any particular importance for us? It is very strange and it is quite certain that it is by reason of its relationship to the body that we do not have the same lively interest in dew as in the rainbow, because the rainbow, we have the feeling that this opens out to the theory of light, at least we have this feeling since Descartes demonstrated it. Yes. Anyway, I am perplexed about the little interest that we have in dew. It is certain that there is something centred on the functions of the body, which ensures that we give a sense to certain things. Dew lacks a little sense. That at least is what I can bear witness to after reading as attentively as I could this 'Essay on dew'. And now I am going to give the floor to Alain Didier Weill, while apologising for having delayed him a little; he will have no more than an hour-and-a quarter to speak to you, instead I think of what I guaranteed for him, which was an hour-and-half.

Alain Didier Weill is going to speak to you about something which has a relationship to Knowledge, namely, 'I know' or 'he knows'. It is on this relationship between 'I know' and 'he knows' that he is going to play.

- Alain Didier Weill: Can we say that I am going to talk about the Passe?

- Lacan: You can also talk about the Passe.
[ADW's lengthy intervention has been included for completeness but has not been as carefully translated and revised as Lacan's own words. CG]

- Alain Didier Weill: The point from which I came to propose to Dr Lacan these elucubrations that I am going to submit to you, comes from what is represented for me by what is called in the Ecole Freudienne, the Passe. Effectively a rumour circulates for some time in the School, which is that the results of the Passe which is supposed to have functioned for a certain number of years, did not respond to the hopes that had been put in it. Given that this idea, like that, that there is the idea of a failure of the past, this is something that personally I find hard to put up with, in the Passe where for me it seems to guarantee what can preserve the essential and what is most living for the future of psychoanalysis; I cogitated on the question a little, and I think I have eventually found what could account for a topological montage which does not exist and which would account for the fact that the jury d'agrement perhaps does not manage to use, and to use what is transmitted to it to advance the crucial problems of psychoanalysis. The circuit that I am going to put in place before you claims to metaphorise by a long circuit in which there would be representable the fundamental movements – you see that I am designating precisely three of them – at the issue of which a subject and his Other can arrive at a precise point, very locatable, that I will call B4-R4 – you will see why – and starting from which I will articulate what seems to me to be, both the problem of the passe, and that of, perhaps, the nature of the short circuit, of what could topologically short circuit what is supposed to happen at the level of the jury d'agrement. Good, I commence therefore.

The subjects that I chose to presentify for you our two analytic partners, can be made familiar to you in that they are supposed to correspond in a certain way to two protagonists most absent in the story of The purloined letter which you know, the very ones, about whom from the beginning to the end there is question, namely, the emissary, the one who is the emissary with the letter who is so far excluded that Poe even, I believe, does not even name him and namely, the receiver of the letter, who – as we know – Lacan showed it to us – is the King. If you allow me, I baptise for the convenience of my presentation, the subject by the name of Bozef and I will keep the name of the one it is destined for, that of the King. My whole montage is going to consist in substituting for the short circuit by which Poe's story keeps his two subjects outside the journeying of the letter, a long zigzag circuit by which the letter starting from position B1 will end by arriving at position B4. The numbering of 1 and 4 that I indicate to you indicate already that I will be led to distinguish 4 places which will differentiate 4 successive positions of the subject and of the Other. I begin therefore with B1.

You see that B, the series of Bs, responds to the subject Bozef, this series of R1, R2, R3 correspond to the progression of the knowledge of the king, R1, R2, R3. By B1, if you wish, I am qualifying the state, of innocence of the subject indeed the infantilism of the subject, when he is uniquely supported by this subjective position which is the following: the Other does not know, the king does not know, does not know what? Well then, quite simply, the content of the letter does not matter, quite simply does not know that the subject knows something about him. R1 represents therefore the radical ignorance of the king; therefore one could say that in the position B1, would be the foolish position of the cogito which could be written: 'He does not know, therefore I am'. The story, if you wish, this position is familiar to you in the measure that we know that it is a position that we know from the analyser; the analyser quite often as we know chooses his analyst while saying unconsciously to himself, while saying to himself, 'I am choosing him, this particular one, because I know I am going to be able to best him' and we know that what he fears the most at the same time is that he will succeed. So then starting from this elementary montage, I continue.

Before putting up Lacan's graph here is how things are going to happen. But now, the story begins; I am going to now make intervene someone that I call, you see that I called him M, M I will call that the messenger, namely, that B1 one day, Bozef who is at B1 is going to give to the messenger in the position of M the message that I called m1 and in m1 he says: The Other does not know, the king does not know. The messenger is designed for that, he is of course a traitor, he transmits to the king the message m1 which is transformed on m of 1, namely, that the king passes from the position of the ignorance R1, to the position of R2 an elementary knowledge: the Other knows, namely, that the subject knows something about me. Starting from there, the message is going to go back to Bozef, our subject, in an inverted form. It is going to come back in two ways as I say, it is going to come back because there will be a return movement, the messenger is going to say to him, is going to find him if you like and going to say to him: I said to the king what you told me. I call this message m1 it is a return on the plane on the axis on the graph, on the axis of i of o; if you wish, it is a specular relation. Another message arrives to Bozef that will be placed for its part on the trajectory of subjectification, that I put in green, that will arrive directly therefore on the plane through the symbolic plane. You see therefore that the important thing here is the fact that Bozef who was in a position of foolishness, of the foolishness of B1, because of the inversion of the message that comes back to him, namely, this time the Other knows, is displaced. He can no longer remain at B1, he finds himself at B2. And at B2, I would say that he is here in the position of semblance, he can still support himself in the position that I would describe as that of duplicity since at B2 he can still say to himself: 'Yes, he knows, but he does not know that I know he knows'. So then I am now going to write, before going any further, the first episode on Lacan's graph.

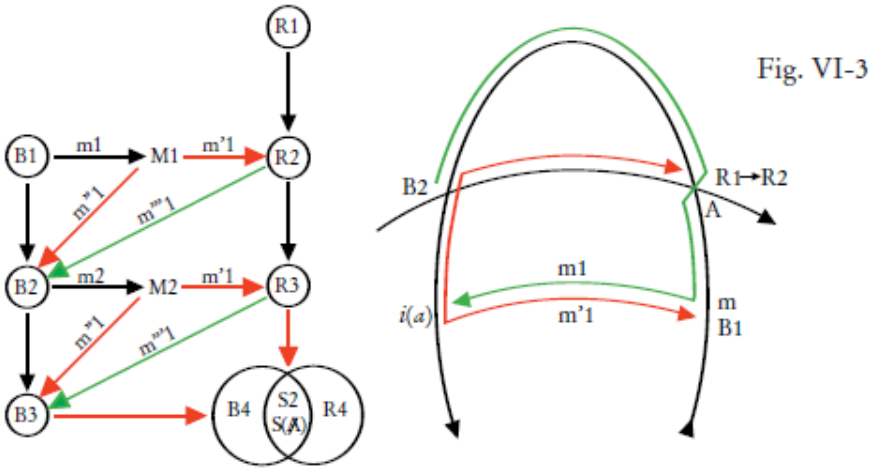

Fig. VI-3

There, the position of the Other, the message leaves from the Other; there is the ego position of Bozef that I am writing as B1. The message starts from Bozef who gives it to the messenger who would be i of o the message that I called m1, namely, that this circuit says: he does not know. The messenger does his business, transmits this message along this path which makes the king go from R1 to R2. The effect starting from there, starting from the new position of the Other is going to carry Bozef who was at B1, here an elementary subject effect what Lacan would call the signified of the Other, at the level of B2, namely, that one can also draw this arrow.

Bozef also receives a message, one might say, at the level in the axis of o – o' of the messenger. You see therefore that our subject Bozef is at B2, I am now going to make, to introduce another graph of Lacan's.

I continue therefore, I left, as you see, Bozef at B2, being sustained by the position of duplicity that I have described for you, since he is in the position of maintaining the idea of the ignorance of the Other. Now things, it is here that things begin to become really interesting for us and much more complicated. Starting from this position B2 of Bozef, here's what is going to happen: Bozef continues the operation of the transmission of his knowledge, namely, that to the messenger that I draw in the position of M2, he is going to transmit a second message that I call m2 and in this message he says to him: 'Yes, he knows, but he does not know that I know'. The messenger at M2 does the same work, retransmits this message to the king, the king passes therefore to a new knowledge, goes from R2 to R3; the knowledge of the king at that point is: 'He knows that I know that he knows that I know'; but that is something that Bozef does not yet know, he will only know it when the messenger makes his last trip, comes back to Bozef and confides to him: 'I told the king that you know that he knows that you know that he knows', namely, that, at this point Bozef whom we have left at B2 is propelled into a new position that I am calling B3, starting from which we are going to question the second graph of Lacan, in a very particular way and starting from which we are going to begin to be able to introduce what is involved in the passe.

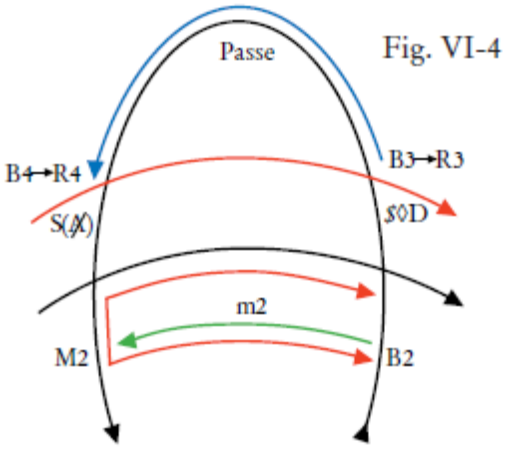

Fig. VI-4

I am therefore going to continue, to end the schema before continuing.

Here is M2, m1, m1.

Bozef whom I left at B2 here (2), I replace here at B2 (1), namely, that he transmits to M2, he transmits m2, he says to him: 'He knows, but he does not know that I know that he knows'. Just like earlier this message arrives at the Other also like the following (2) and the return of this message to Bozef puts him in this very particular position of being confronted to an Other from whom he can no longer hide anything. The king...

Good, I hope that you can follow me, even though it's a bit of a zigzag. What happens therefore when the king is at R3, namely, when he is in the position of knowing what I have indicated to you and that this knowledge is known by the return of the messenger to Bozef, namely, that Bozef may think: 'The king knows that I know that he knows that I know'. What is going to happen at that very moment and what is going to introduce us to what follows, is that, even though, at B2, Bozef in the semblance, could still lay claim to a little bit of being by saying: 'He knows, but he does not know and I can all the same still be', at B3, because of what one could call 'the absolute knowledge of the Other', Bozef, the position of the cogito of Bozef will be completely dispossessed of his thought. At that level, if the other knows everything, it is not because the Other knows everything, it is because he can no longer hide anything from the Other, but the problem is to hide what? Because what is revealed to the Other at that moment, is not so much the lie in which Bozef held him, it is that there emerges for Bozef at that moment the fact that his lie reveals to him that in fact, behind this lie, there was hidden a lie of a completely different nature and another dimension. If the king is in this position, in this position of R3 in which he would know everything, this all, namely, the most radical incognito of Bozef, which disappears, Bozef is in the position, in the position in which he find himself and what I am going to show you, corresponds to what Lacan names the position of the eclipsing of the subject, of fading before the signifier of demand, which is written on the graph – this also designates the drive, I am not going to talk about that now - $◊D.

I must continue now, I would like you to sense that since at R3 nothing more can be hidden, while there is opening up for the subject B3 the last hiding place, namely, the one that he did not know was hidden. And what he uncovers, is that by involuntarily hiding, by having a lie that he can designate, he avoided in fact a lie of which he knew nothing, which dwelt in him and which constituted him as subject. Therefore, this knowledge of which he knew nothing is going to emerge at R3 with respect to the Other who henceforth knows everything. When I say 'emerge with regard to the Other', it is really in the proper sense that this expression must be understood, for he does not emerge with respect to this Other, it is precisely what was withdrawn during the originating creation of the Subject, what was withdrawn from the Subject, the signifier S_2, and which constituted him as such, as subject supporting speech, as subject acceding to speech in the demand of the fact of the withdrawal of this signifier S_2. Now, what happens? Here we have the signifier S_2 reappearing in the Real, for that is what must be said.

Effectively the problem of primary repression, one cannot say that the return of the primary repression is produced in the Symbolic as secondary repression would, since it is itself the author of it. If it comes back, it can only be because in the Real and it is insofar that it is as such it manifests, I would say by a look, a look of the Real, before which the Subject is absolutely without recourse.

I am not going to go on about that, but if you reflect on it, you will see that the position of knowledge implied by R3, by the Other at R3, could correspond to what happens, if you wish, in that which is supposed to be the Last Judgement, at this point where the subject will not be accused finally of lying in the present, since precisely at the point B3 – R3 he is no longer lying, since he is revealed in his non being, but what is subsequently revealed to him, is that he did not cease to lie in the imperfect, even though he said a word. This position can also indicate to you, Knowledge at R3 can also open up perspectives, if you want to reflect, on what might be involved in racist or segregationist knowledge, but this would be a position of knowledge in which I would see the subject incarnate this S_2 in the Real.

As you see these are paths that I am launching here, since it is not our subject and I'm not going to come back to it. It would also be necessary to articulate the return of this S_2 into the Real with what is involved in terms of delusion, to seriously articulate the aphanisis and the delusional position in the measure that in the two cases the signifier returns to the Real, but nevertheless one could say that in the case of the non-psychotic who loses speech like the psychotic, nevertheless one could compare his position to that of these peoples invaded by foreigners who carry out a politics of scorched earth, who burn everything, who burn everything in order to keep something, namely, that the invasion is not total. And what is effectively maintained, what remains once the subject disappears, since, if you reflect on it, what is happening at R3, is that the signifier of the Urverdrängung returning into the Real, it is nothing less than primal repression, the subject of the unconscious which disappears: if you like, the bar of the unconscious, this bar which separates the o and S_2 being barred, makes them appear in S_2 in the Real and in the o in the Real, and that is what remains, and that this is a position of total desubjectification.

I am coming now to the most enigmatic point of the business, which is that this position in which the subject finds itself thunderstruck under the look of the S_2 in the real, a thunderstruck position, without speech before this monstrous look, the word monstrous is not here by chance, because it is a matter of the reality which shows itself (se montre), that this 'monster', which is precisely the most radical incognito and that, if this S_2 shows itself, what supports speech itself, namely, its effacing, can no longer arrive, and if a monster is monstrous, it is nothing other than the cutting of speech.

The high point of the riddle that we are getting to, is to try to interpret how Bozef being in B3, if we posit that he is not going to remain there all his life, in eternity like a petrified subject, fixed in stone, under the look of Medusa, what is going to enable the subject at B3 get out of it? And how is he going to get out of it?

So then the first step that I am posing, is that you see that at that moment there there is no longer the support of the messenger; the messenger was at the end of his course and at the end of his recourse to Bozef and for the first time Bozef is confronted to the Other and with this Other, namely, with the one to whom the letter was really addressed and meeting whom he avoided as much as possible, at that moment he is face to face with this Other and he cannot do anything other than say a word recognising this Other, one word and one alone. The important thing is to see the link that there is between the fact that he can only say a single word, with the fact, at the moment when he gives up on the messenger, namely, the moment at when there are no longer two of them to transmit the message to the Other. It is also then the moment when the Other is going to receive a message that will not come from the two, it will no longer be duplicity, one could say that the position of duplicity at that moment, interiorised by Bozef, metamorphises him by dividing him, that is the division and the price of 'one word'.

You see there moreover that duplicity is without doubt the best defence against division. The fact that there is a link between a single possible word, Bozef is going to be confronted with the king at R3, there is only one possible word to which I will return later, what is the only thing that he can say to him? He will say to him: 'It is you'. An 'it is you' that is extended moreover – I will come back on this later, into 'it is us'. And the single word that he can say to him, he says to him at the same time: there is only one person to whom I can say it and it is already from topology that we can see that one word can only be given at one locus and that the tongue itself shows you that it knows this topology since it tells you that someone that has speech has only one and cannot have another; someone who has no speech, precisely has only one and at the same time there is the notion in the tongue of the destination, since, to give his word, is only conceivable if one can keep it namely, in fact a word that can be kept, the point therefore at which I arrive, is that the message delivered is this 'it is you' and I am going to write it for you in a way at a certain level, I am going to write a letter which is going to go from B3 to R3, B3 and R3 are going to meet at the level of this message which I will further explicitate now as being this S of Ø. I am going to give you a first way of writing it.

What I have drawn on the schema on the left is that when Bozef with his back to the wall this time can only say one word to the king by the very fact that he addresses this word to the king, the king one last time is displaced, migrates, migrates from the place where he was, namely, of the Real, migrates anew into the locus, into the symbolic locus where there is found in the position of R4, Bozef saying 'It is you' who is in the position of B4, the S(O), I am writing of the meeting, of the communion between B4 and R4, both putting in common at that moment their bar and that is why I wrote in the lunlua S_2 and S(O); I hope to be able to explicitate more rigorously in what is going to follow.

The point of the enigma on which I would like to keep you, is that, in the message delivered at S(Ø), in the 'it is you', is that the subject who keeps his word – as we have seen – is here in a position much more of keeping it, but of supporting it, which is something quite different. What does it mean to sustain a word? It is much easier first of all to say what it is not, for example someone who says to you: 'I think that, when Lacan says the unconscious is structured like a language, I think that he is right, I agree with him', even if the subject may assure himself of his thinking in all good faith by thinking that he thinks that the unconscious is structured like a language, I ask you: what does that prove? Nothing at all. In other words: is it because a subject thinks that he is thinking something that he really thinks it, namely, is it because he thinks he is thinking it that the enunciating, the subject of the unconscious which is in him, corresponds to what he says, in other words is he responsible for what he says? That is what is meant by sustaining one's word among others. It's a first approach. This having been said, that our enunciating corresponds, sustains our enunciation, I was going to say, praise be to God, there is no proof for it. There is no proof for it, but what there is eventually is a proof and that is how I believe one can understand the passe, the passe as a topological montage that would allow us to take into account if effectively when a subject enunciates something, he is capable of bearing witness, namely, of transmitting the articulation of his enunciating to his enunciated. In other words, it is not a matter of saying, but to show how it is possible not to go back on one's word.

The question therefore at which I will go further on, is that if this S(O) which Bozef reaches at R4, if he reaches there according to what I am showing you, the fact is that it is from a certain place – the word he uses doesn't matter, it is banal, it is you, it's chit chat, it's nothing at all – the weight of truth of this message, is that it is a locus. The question that I am now going to pose and develop is: is this locus from which the subject speaks transmissible? Can it reach, for example in the case of the passe, can it reach the jury d'agrement? Good. The enigma from the moment when the subject is capable, more than keeping his word, of sustaining it, namely, to be at a point where he reaches something that must be recognised as being of the order of a certainty and of a certain desire let us try to give an account of it, it is not easy. It is not easy because precisely in S(O) the object of desire or the object of certainty is something of which one can say nothing. But notice already, in order to circumscribe more closely what I am trying to say, it is in a general fashion that the people who, in life, inspire confidence in you, as it is put, are people that precisely you feel are desiring, but with a desire that remains I would say enigmatic to themselves, and quite the contrary, those who inspire in you what I would call an ethical judgement that is eventually of distrust, who will make you say: he's a hypocrite, he's a bad penny or he's ambitious, anyway terms of this kind, this doesn't matter, these are precisely people of whom you feel that the object of desire is not unknown to themselves, that they can very precisely designate it, I would even say that what makes you uneasy perhaps in them, is that the voice of phantasy is so strong in them that there will be no hope for the voice of the S(Ø); since I am talking about trust you can clearly see that that poses the problems of the conditions by which an analyst can be worthy of trust? How is he so? Briefly I would say for the moment precisely that his desire should not be placed like the one that I have tried to describe, but this his desire should not have as a voice of clogging up the bar by making the object emerge but that his desire is to maintain this bar, and to bring it to incandescence just as what happens at the point B4 – R4 where the bar is carried to this point of extreme incandescence, I would say briefly. All of this does not yet give us an account of why at S(O), while the subject has no guarantees, what ensures that he reaches the point of being able to sustain what he says? And how he must account for the fact that if he gets there it is along the path of B3-R3, - as you remember – when the Other is in the position of absolute Knowledge, the subject can arrive at S(Ø) after having undergone the experience of the dispossession of his thinking, a total dispossession of his thinking.

Let us suppose, if you wish, to go a little further, an analyst who has not Passed through this dispossession of his thinking and who maintains with psychoanalytic theory a relationship of a possessor, of relationships of possession comparable to those, if you wish of the miser and his moneybox. Such an analyst, in his relationship to the theory, naturally can only see the gain of the operations; the gain of the operation is obvious; the thing is within hands reach and by definition what he does not see, is what he loses in the operation. What does he lose? Precisely what he loses, is the dimension of topology that there is in him, namely, the dimension of the locus of enunciating, namely, the dimension of presence which in him can answer 'Present', answer to what he enunciates. What I would then say, is that, in this position, is not the subject, the analyst in question, in a position that corresponds psychoanalytically to flat denial, namely,, is it possible on the one hand to say yes to knowledge and on the other hand to say no to the locus from which this knowledge is emitted. If this split takes place, one may think that the truth which is in the subject having brought about this split, by having remained outside the circuit of speech, is going to short circuit the circuit of speech as, if you wish, reminding him of an absolutely painful nostalgia that must never be reawakened. That is why I would say, if a parl'être pulls himself together at that moment and makes a completely different sound be heard, Lacan for example in his heroic days, the analyst in question – let us think of the IPA or even, without going that far, to what happened among ourselves – can literally not support the echo that this sends back to him. This split of which I am speaking, which it is tempting to bring about, because it avoids division, implies in effect for the analyst, if he is split, that implies that his Other also is split and his Other is split, I would say, between an Other that would never lie and an Other which always lies, if you wish the Devil, the one who deceives, and to defy whom it is enough, in order not to make a mistake, it is enough not to be a dupe. You know well that the non-dupes err, and you see that it is the renunciation of this duplicity of the Other that the subject is necessarily in a position of passing on, namely, of being a heretic. And I would point out to you that Lacan, more than once, designated himself specifically as a heretic, and especially as passing it on. My transitory hypothesis, is to say that in the red arrow which goes from B4 to R4 (1), which make S_2 and S(Ø) communicate, an arrow that I drew above in violet (3), which makes one go from the fading of $ ◊ D to S(Ø), is the Passe, the movement by which something about the Passe can be said.

Now let us explore still more, if you wish, the scandalous character, that's how it should be described, of the message transmitted in S(Ø), the message of the heretic. I told you at the outset there are no longer these two divinities, there is therefore no longer a guarantee for the moneybox. The subject speaks having in himself a responder to what he says. What is interesting, when we read, - I am making a rapid parenthesis – The Manual of Inquisitors, and they are interesting because they correspond literally to what happened in a recent Passe for us – the fact is that the inquisitor picks out perfectly what is in question in this S(Ø); he picks it out in his way of defining a heretic: a heretic is not somebody who errs, who is in error, 'errare humanum est', it is the one who perseveres, it is the one who says 'I say and I repeat', namely, the one who poses an 'I' to which another diabolical 'I' – 'errare diabolicum' – a diabolical one responds, and effectively this I of enunciating, is diabolical because like the devil, it is diabolically ungraspable: the devil does not always lie. If he always lied that would come down to saying that he tells the truth. You see that the inquisitor, clearly spots what is at stake, namely, that it is in terms of an articulation between the two 'I's', at the level of this S(Ø). And that is why, whatever he says, he does not demand an avowal of the heretic, but a disavowal. You sense the nuance between the two, since I spoke to you earlier about the disavowal at the very heart of the inquisitor in this split of the two Others. This disavowal moreover, notice that I am not throwing stones at anyone, this disavowal lies in wait for us at every moment. It is not all that rare to see for example an analyst in supervision who, at a given moment in his journey, prefers to lie on the couch rather than to continue the supervision, and what one often sees is that, if he wants to lie on the couch, it is as if lying on the couch the rule being to be able to say anything at all, as if, at that very moment, he had disengaged himself from the fact that he had to answer for what he says, that he can talk without responsibility. This analyser can believe that for a certain time until the day he discovers, on the couch, that these signifiers that he thought he did not have to answer in the sense of responsibility, he has to answer for, and that day perhaps the analyser, for him, the Passe is profiled because at that moment, one could say that he is no longer simply the disciple of Lacan or of Freud, but he becomes the disciple of his symptom, namely, that he allows himself to be taught by it and that if for example the analyser in question was Bozef, however complicated may be Bozef's path, he can only discover that in writing this outline, that this outline in a certain way has already been sketched out, perhaps even before he learned how to read, on the graphs of a certain Dr Lacan. One could say at that moment that the analyser no longer is the delegate of the master, because he no longer has to be, he no longer has to be I would say carried by the knowledge of the master, because he makes himself the carrier, and this is what he delivers to S(Ø). I am going round in circles to approach little by little, closer and closer, the core of this S(Ø) namely, at the point that we are at, I could say that Bozef, it would be at the end of this journey that he is responsible for the graphs that he writes and only at that very moment.

Now the problem is to effectively account for the nature of this certitude and of this enjoyment of the Other that Lacan talks to us about. I am obliged to go quickly because time is effectively passing.

At S(O) a contradictory phenomenon takes place, which is that of a communion – the word is Lacan's in The formations of the unconscious, you will find it – is that of a communion coinciding with a separation between the subject and the Other. The paradox is to comprehend why it is at the moment of the dissolution of the transference, that a certainty may be borne in the subject, and perhaps uniquely at that very moment. For that I am obliged to make a rapid return back to what is the point that we were at at B3-R3, the point of désêtre.

At that point I would say – I am obliged because to comprehend what is the nature of the emergence of the subject in a pure state – at B3-R3, rapidly, the subject was in a position where the primary repression had disappeared, fixed by the look of the Real. What is going to allow the subject to unfix himself – remember moreover, that on the subject of fixation, Freud articulates it to primary repression – what is going to allow the subject to unfix himself, what is going to allow the Other which is in the Real to reintegrate his symbolic site? It is there moreover that the art of the analyst must make itself heard. An example: an analyser in this position, where for him the knowledge of the Other wanders around like that in the Real, puts pressure on his analyst to see the way in which the analyst is going to manifest himself, from where he speaks, one day telephones him to press for a rendezvous to see the reaction, the analyst responds: 'If it were necessary, we would see one another'. The message, the signified, has nothing very original about it, nevertheless this message has the effect of a radical interpretation for the analyser, the effect being of managing to reconvey to the Other in his symbolic locus, quite simply because of the syntactic articulation, which ensured that his analyst by finding the formula 'If it were necessary', by the introduction of the 'it', subjecting himself as analyser to the dominance, to the predominance of the signifier.

In the point B3-R3 where the subject has no recourse, he has no recourse 'to comprehend this notion of being without recourse', evokes the night terrors of the child. Why effectively in the dark is the child in this position? I would say precisely that in the dark what happens for the child is that he does not have a corner to go to where he is not under the look of the Other; because in the dark there is no little corner. And it is precisely in answer to the fact that under the look of the Real, there is not, for the subject, at B3-R3 any recourse to any corner whatsoever, that the recourse summoned by the signifier of the Name of the Father is going to be to create a little nook, namely, a nook that is going to withdraw him from the Other, but which is also going to withdraw him from himself by constituting him as not knowing, since it is precisely this corner itself, the corner in which he has the most of himself, the most symbolic of himself that is going to be evaporated. I would say that at that moment – scripture says to us 'let there be light' – what is at stake at that moment is 'let there be a hole', this is an expression of Lacan's. And this is perhaps what happened in the syntactical formula that I evoked earlier. Having said this, how is it that the subject – I am turning all the time around that as you can see – who has lost speech, is going to rediscover it and is going to be able to say 'It's you'? Well then I would say due to the intervention of the signifier of the Name of the Father, which recreated the primal repression, which made S_2 disappear and restored the o-object in its place, because of the operation of this signifier of the Name of the Father, the subject reaches a different point of view, a point of view where he does not know the equivalence between the knowledge of the Other and the key which is lacking in him. He discovers that it is not because the Other recognises that he is lacking, that there is not in him the key, that he lacks the essential key of his being, it is not because the Other recognises that that he knows it. I would even say that when he discovers that the Other can recognise the existence of this key while not knowing it, namely, not being able to restore it to him, if, in a first moment he may fall into despair, in truth this is going to reintroduce him to hope, because if the Other is in the position of recognising what he does not know, that introduces the dimension of the fact that the Other himself has lost this same key, that he knows well what lack is involved, and the hope that is opened up then, is to make present the absence of this lost uninscribable thing, and the hope, is precisely that the uninscribable can cease not to be written. And that is what is delivered at S(Ø).

The unlikely paradox on which one ends up, as one might say, is how a signifier, this signifier of S(Ø), can assume this unthinkable contradiction of being at once what maintains open the gap of what does not cease to be written – when you read, when you hear music that overwhelms you or a poem that overwhelms you, the word that scores a bulls eye with you, one can say that opens to the maximum this dimension of primal repression – how then can this signifier maintain this contradiction of maintaining this gap and at the same time be what ceases not to be written, for example a very banal note in the diachronic scale a completely stupid lah?

You see that this wager nevertheless, is what is realised in our third moment of the S(Ø), of which one could say that the production, of this S(Ø), is the result of an ultimate dialectic between the subject and the Other through which the one and the other, by becoming two as I might say, resurrect literally in a movement of encounter – through which, I repeat, Lacan has not hesitated to employ the word of communion, in the production of the witticism – this very bar, this very bar whose paradox is to associate and to disassociate at the same time. From this, if you wish, from this encounter of the subject and the Other, some specifications, three specifications: first of all it is a matter of a communion, it is not a matter of collaboration. We know what the subject is capable of when he becomes a collaborator. Another point: this mode of communion which is produced in S(Ø) is a mode in which, at that moment, the subject does not receive his message in an inverted form since it would be the only unlikely moment, outside time, really outside time, in which the Other would communicate in the same knowledge at the same time. When I say knowledge, it is precisely the knowledge of this bar of this non-being. You see that the experience of this lack of being at S(Ø) – and precisely you have to distinguish between aphanisis which for its part is one could say an excommunication of the subject – here it is not a matter of being, here one could say that effectively it is a matter of a communion in non-being and that it is in this putting in common of the signifier of S_2 and of the signifier lacking to the Other that there is delivered this signifier that I articulated and that I am now going to articulate more closely to the Passe.

One might say if you wish, that the bar of the subject and of the Other, by communicating together, carried the subject into the incandescence of this shared lack to the very sources of existence, well beyond the object way beyond the phantasy. The very fact that along this path the subject renounces the phantasy, short-circuits it, demonstrates, at that moment, that what is accentuated by him is the search for this experience of lack in a pure state. Finally you see that what is proper to this response, the 'It's you', as I define it at that moment, that the proper of this response is that it is a metaphor in a pure state. If you wish, if the subject had responded: 'It's you' to the Other who would have asked him: 'So then yes or no is it me?' and that then he would have answered, his word, his enunciation would have been the same but would not have had this effect of a message of S(Ø) by situating itself, I would say, clearly metonymically, like this aphasic described by Jakobson who by metaphorical aphasia, could not enunciate the adverb 'no' except if one said to him: 'Say no' then he can respond: 'No, since you say that I can't say it.....' demonstrating, if you wish, by that, that the word itself, if it has fallen from its locus of enunciating, falls itself as a simple metonymical remainder and loses its value of metaphorical message, as long as you see that – I am coming back to it, this S(Ø) only has sense when articulated at its locus of emission.

Good, since it's late, I am going to end with the problem of the Passe skipping over a certain number of things.

Let us take up again our story of Bozef. Can we say that Bozef, as things have happened here, has Passed the Passe, namely, we see that Bozef has arrived by delivering his message 'It's you', corresponds to what I have located, namely, has managed to do without an intermediary, one is no longer 2, one is only 1, to address a locus. Bozef, therefore has got to the point, the topological enunciating point articulated to his enunciated message. But Bozef being this point, is he for all that, if he is, as one might say 'passant', is he for all that capable of testifying, of realising that he is in the Passe from which he speaks? Is he capable of it? The king himself who is supposed to be R4, in the position of the analyst, is for his part capable of recognising the locus from where Bozef speaks. He hears him. But the king – it is not by chance that the king who is the analyst – the king is not the jury d'agrément. I come back to my question: if the whole value of the message of S(Ø) is that it should be emitted at a certain locus, how can this locus be transmitted get to the jury? Because, in S(Ø), Bozef can sustain what he's saying, but in the name of a truth that he finds himself experiencing but of which he knows nothing: he knows nothing about this locus. In other words: if Bozef is in a certain way, in the Passe, I would not say that for all that he occupies the position of a passant, insofar as being placed at the locus of truth at that moment, he is not in the right place to say something about it. Can we at the same time speak about this locus, B4-R4, and say this locus?

We have already said, if what is proper to this S(Ø) is not to be able to be hidden in any moneybox, to return to our metaphor of the possessive analyst, we take another step and now we are saying, that as a locus, this locus does not say itself as such and cannot arrive as such to the jury.

Good, I'm going to illustrate that in the following way: when you hear a Lacanian analyst, a Lacanian disciple speaking about Lacan passant, since Lacan has defined himself as not ceasing to pass the Passe, when you hear this passant, can you say that in hearing this passant you understand where Lacan is speaking from? You cannot say so. From where does Lacan speak, the S(Ø) of Lacan, you can pick out eventually when you hear him or when you read him; when you hear him, I point out to you here that I am taking another step, that he always supports himself with something written. Another example: do you think that what happened to psychoanalysis, before Lacan got involved, is to be imputed uniquely to the fact that analysts of that time were bad Passers or indeed that the jury d'agrément that they represented, aggregated in a way that was not that.

The two hypotheses are perhaps true, but not sufficient. If Lacan at a given time, reminded analysts that it would be better to read Freud than to read Fenichel, what was he doing by reminding them of that, if not that if they really wanted to agree with Freud, they needed a Passer, is, I was going to say, worthy of this definition, namely, the topological arrangement, the writing of Freud which testifies that Freud does not separate what he says from the locus from which he says it, and if one wants to bring about, that in certain psychoanalytic societies, a dumbing down of Freud's work – you can hear that in this dumbing the word vel is barred, namely, that one no longer hears any more the dimension of 'Freud parl'être': what one ends up with is effectively a taking possession of the theory that one can put in a moneybox.

What is happening, is it not, the danger, if the analyst therefore does not make himself a Passer, namely, if, I may say that the very reading of Freud, of the Passer Freud, qua manifesting his decision, does no longer bring about in them an effect of division, namely, this exigency of the S(Ø) which makes one sense that Freud, in himself, bears witness to this indivisible locus of what he says and which in fact makes him the responding heretic of his word. Because what is proper to a writing is it not – I am giving you this last example before concluding – the proper of a writing whatever it may be is that in a writing the subject of the enunciated and the subject of enunciating may well be present, but it is not for all that that the writing will be a Passer: the writing will only be a Passer if the two 'I's' are articulated in a transmissible way. Take the rather characteristic example of the actor, of the interpreter; a heart-rent interpreter, when he interprets a text, a writing, it will be heart-rending for this jury who is the spectator, his tears are going to draw tears from you and though he says he's acting, one could say that if he cries, if he is overwhelmed somewhere, it is because his enunciating has been shaken by the signifiers of the author; in such a way that what I am saying to you is that it is not the interpreter who is the Passer of the text, it is the text which is the Passer of the enunciating of the actor. I even heard it said in the Ecole Freudienne, these are the sorts of things that are said, that some Passers that have been accepted by the jury, if the Passer is accepted, it is because he will have been able to give rise in his Passer to an enunciating of the Passer which, for its part, Passes with the jury and that, since it gets Passed, it makes the rest pass, namely, the Passer.

I come back to my starting point to tell you that it is even more complicated than that. If the author himself, of whom I am speaking, plays his proper role in the fiction that I told you about, that doesn't prove, if he played his own personage, that he would play the role to perfection, crying out the truth as one might say – this has happened to great authors like Moliere – that does not prove that, if chance accepted this fiction, if the chance of life made him encounter the same situation as the one that he described to his personage, that does not prove that at that moment he would not be gauche, borrowed; and nevertheless the signifiers in question, it is not a question, as for an actor, of borrowed signifiers, in principle they are his own. I come therefore to the idea that the author is not at all be superimposed on the one who produces on the stage and I return to Bozef. And on that I end.

Bozef therefore, at S(Ø) is in the position of being a Passer, but he is not in the position of bearing witness from where he is passing. What can account for his position, I ask you, from where he speaks, if not this concatenation of graphs that I have drawn for you – I unfortunately was not able to finish them – that I drew for you on the board. If this hypothesis is true, namely, if the Passer, this writing, these graphs function as Passers in that they testified from the locus of enunciating strictly articulated to enunciation which is the Passer, since it is not Bozef? I would simply answer and I would say that fundamentally the Passer is the writer of the one who has put in place, who has written this writing, these graphs. I would even say that the example, if Lacan says he never ceases passing the pass it is perhaps for this reason; he does not cease and we can imagine that he will never cease; he does not cease because seminar after seminar he creates, he resurrects the Passer, which is his writing, namely, that he creates the conditions of his division. He creates like Bozef at a given moment on his journey with his back to the wall, puts himself in the place of the transmitter in order to make himself at the same time an emitter and a transmitter in the violet arrow when he renounces the intermediary, Lacan, seminar after seminar, creating and recreating his Passer, can effectively not cease to pass the pass, all the more so that the Other to whom he addresses himself is certainly not a jury from which he expects some sort of Amen. Yes. I imagine the negative reactions that will be thrown back at me, of saying that a writing could play the function of a Passer for a jury; I incidentally learned from Jean Clavreul, that this is a proposition that he had made, some years ago, to think of this notion of a writing as a Passer; the objection that will be made immediately to me is to say; to make a Passer out of a writing, effectively, is a matter then of making a report, a report why not an academic masters? Naturally, the response that I would give immediately to this contradictor, would be to say that if the one who writes, if the Other to whom he addresses himself is identifiable to a jury, effectively what he will produce will eventually effectively be perhaps an excellent report but effectively academic. If in this writing he bears witness, as I think I have tried to do, of the locus of the way in which an enunciation and an enunciating are articulated topologically in a grounded and articulatable way, and that besides what is articulated between these the lines, Passes the presence that corresponds to the writing, the heretical responding presence, which for its part is the guarantee that it is not an academic writing, but effectively a writing that creates the topological arrangements where at the same time a parl'être assumes, indeed lives at the same time his division of Passer-passing.

Good in conclusion what I would tell you, is that it is for nothing other than the very consequences of this hypothesis of work that did not authorise me to make the Passe as it functions topologically in this moment in the Freudian school, that made me produce what appears to me to be something like this Passer which is this writing, which, by its topological arrangement puts in place, has allowed me to account for a possible transmissible articulation between the two 'I's'. To whom this writing was destined before I did it, I knew strictly nothing before Dr Lacan asked me to speak to you about it.

Seminar 7: Wednesday 15 February 1977

To give you an idea of why, the last time, I had Alain Didier Weill speak – I had asked him to speak, it is obviously because I worry myself about this business of the Borromean chain. This is a Borromean chain. As you see, this element here, could be folded back, in such a way that these two circles are buckled like the ones that you see here, which is what a Borromean knot realises. It is absolutely not completely simple and the fact that on several occasions I disturbed Pierre Soury who is someone of whom I dare to believe...but of whom I dare to believe that I contributed something to the fact that he has given an awful lot to the Borromean knot. I most recently posed him the question of how four tetrahedrons could be knotted in a Borromean way among themselves. He right away gave me the solution, a solution that I verified as being valid. It is something which implies what you see here, namely, not a relation between these terms which is spherical, but a relation that I could call toric. Suppose that...

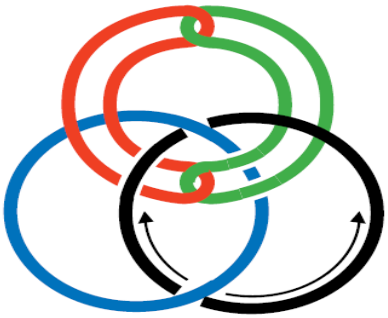

Fig. VII-1

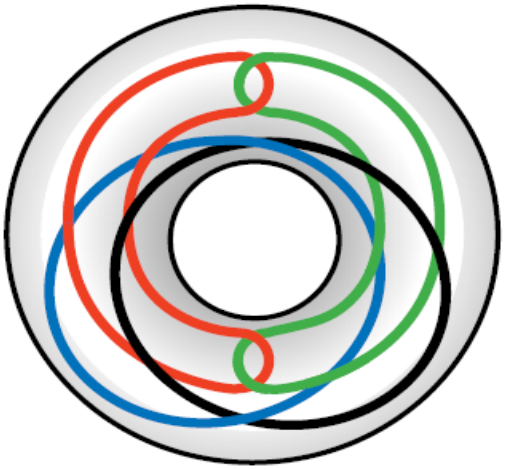

Fig. VII-2

It seemed to me that the mode in which – but I only got it last night – the mode in which Pierre Soury sent me the knot, the Borromean knot of the four tetrahedrons is just as toric. This simply to explain to you that it worried me to know whether, the application of the Borromean knot to a space spherically representable also generated a toric space and this in order to explain to you that in short, since I was completely entangled in the midst of all of that, it was to Alain Didier Weill that I made a call, a call to substitute himself for me in this enunciation, because I had expected great promise on why he had put forward the name of Bozef. This name of Bozef that he brings in like an intruder into The purloined letter, this name of Bozef, I challenged him about this name Bozef and this famous 'I know that he knows' – that he, the King knows – 'because I had informed him of it'. Informed of what, this is what is not said.

In principle Alain Didier Weill, by introducing the Bozef into the story of The purloined letter, does not formally know what he is putting forward. Witness the question that I posed him and which he answered. He answered: if Bozef could be substituted for a character in Poe's story, it could only be the Queen, eventually the minister when he is – as I underlined – in a feminised position. It is a fact that the fact of introducing himself in the way that you know, by filching the letter which for that reason is said to be purloined, while what I enunciate, in re-establishing Poe's text, The purloined letter, namely, the letter that does not arrive, the letter whose circuit is extended. On this I made a certain number of remarks that you will find in my text, a text which is at the start of what is called my Ecrits. I show how striking it is to see that the fact of being in short in a state of dependency on this letter feminizes a personage who – one could put this otherwise – is not precisely lacking in pluck, were it only from the fact of filching the letter which the Queen knows that he possesses and he is feminised for all that, and not because of the trials he endures in hiding it from the Other, who is the King, this scandalous letter. He says to himself: the Other does not know. But this is simply equivalent to the fact that he holds the letter. He for his part knows, hence the extrapolation that Alain Didier Weill makes, an extrapolation which depends on the fact of holding the letter. That he hides it from the Other, does not ensure that the King knows anything at all about it.

Alain Didier Weill pursues: the way in which the story of the Queen of the story is different to Bozef depends on the fact that, if the Queen does indeed carry out the trials opened with the Minister of these 4 moments of knowledge that he himself has described and that he finds the trace of in Poe by the ascendency that the Minister has gained at the expense of the knowledge that the abductor has, of the knowledge that the victim has of its abductor and of which the four moments are according to him: the Minister knows that the Queen knows that the Minister knows that she knows. It is true that this can be picked out, and that following on this, Alain Didier Weill, in his letter, points out to me that the Queen does not for all that experience this objective dispossession by the Minister as the subjective dispossession at which Bozef arrives at the level that he enunciated for you, the last time, as B3-R3. It is true that here there is a deficiency in the enunciation that gave us at the last session. But, in this regard. I disagree. Bozef, even though he has had a name bestowed on him – and this indeed is the flaw in which I surprise– Bozef even though he has been given a name, is not something which deserves to be named, I mean that it is not something which is like something which, let us say, is seen. It is not nameable. Bozef is, I would say, the incarnation of Absolute Knowledge, and what Alain Didier Weill extrapolates, completely in the margins of Poe's tale, is, the journeying that starts from this hypothesis, namely, that Bozef is the incarnation of what I will specify soon, of what is meant by Absolute Knowledge, shows the journeying starting from this hypothesis that he is himself, Bozef, this incarnation, shows the journeying of a truth which in fact is nowhere made obvious. At no moment, does the Minister who has kept this letter in short as a pledge of the good will of the Queen, at no moment has the Minister even the idea of communicating this letter, to the King for example, who is moreover the only one who would find himself in the position of understanding its consequences.

The truth, one might say, 'demands' to be said. It has no voice, to 'demand', to be said, since in short it can happen, as is said – and this indeed is what is extraordinary about language – it can happen – how has French which must be considered as an individual, has it put this form into use? – it can happen, I would say according to it, the concrete French that is at stake, it can happen, according to it, that no one says it, not even Bozef; and this indeed is what in fact happens, I say, namely, that this mythical Bozef, since he is not in Poe's tale, says absolutely nothing. Absolute Knowledge, I would say, does not speak at any price. It is silent if it wishes to be silent. What I called Absolute Knowledge on this particular occasion, is the following: it is simply that there is knowledge somewhere, not just anywhere at all, in the Real, and this thanks to the apparent existence of a species for which – as I said – there is no sexual relationship. It is a purely accidental existence, but on which one reasons starting from the fact, as I might say, starting from the fact that it is capable of enunciating something, about appearance of course since I underline apparent existence. The orthography that I give to the name paraître that I write parêtre, it is only about the parêtre that we have to know, being on this occasion only being one part of parl'être, namely, of what is made up uniquely of what speaks.

What is meant by Knowledge as such? It is Knowledge in so far as it is in the Real. This Real is a notion that I elaborated by having put it into the Borromean knot with that of the Imaginary and of the Symbolic. The Real, as it appears, the Real tells the Truth, but it does not speak and one must speak in order to say anything. The Symbolic, for its part, supported by the signifier, only tells lies when it speaks; and it speaks a lot. It ordinarily expresses itself by the Verneinung, but the contrary of the Verneinung, as someone who was good enough to take the floor during my first seminar, the contrary of the Verneinung, in other words of what is accompanied by negation, the contrary of the Verneinung does not give the Truth. It exists when one speaks of a contrary, one is always speaking about something that exists, and which is true about one particular among others; but there is no universal that corresponds to it in that case. And that by which the Verneinung is typically recognised, is that one must say something false, to succeed in getting across a truth. Something false is not a lie, it is only a lie if it is willed to be such, which often happens, if it is aiming in a way at a lie passing for the truth; but it must be clearly said that, apart from psychoanalysis, it is rare. It is in psychoanalysis that this promotion of the Verneinung, namely, of the lie willed as such to get a truth across, is exemplary. All this, of course, is only knotted by means of the Imaginary which is always wrong. It is always wrong, but it is on it that there depends what is called consciousness.

Consciousness is very far from being knowledge, since, what it lends itself to is very precisely falsity. 'I know' never means anything, and one can easily wager, that what one knows is false; is false but is sustained by consciousness, whose characteristic is precisely to support this false by its consistency. To the point that one could say that, one should look twice before admitting something obvious, that it must be sifted as such, that nothing is sure in matters of obviousness, and that that is why I enunciated that the obvious (l'évidence) must be emptied out (évider) that what is obvious depends on this emptying out.

It is very striking that – I can well, for my part also, go on to the order of confidences with which I am crushed in my daily analyses – an 'I know' that is conscious, namely, not simply knowledge, but the will not to change, is something which is, I can confide in you, experienced very early on, experienced by the fact of someone, like everyone, who was close to me, namely, the one that I called at that time, I was two years older than her, two and a half years, my little sister, she is called Madeleine and she said to me one day, not 'I know', because the 'I' would have been too much, but 'Manène knows'.

The unconscious is an entity that I try to define by the Symbolic, which is only in short an extra entity. An entity with which one must know how to deal. Knowing how to deal with it, is not the same thing as a knowledge, as the Absolute Knowledge of which I spoke earlier. The unconscious is what precisely makes something change, what reduces what I called the sinthome, the sinthome which I write with the orthography that you know.

I always had to deal with consciousness, but in the form which formed part of the unconscious, since it is a person a 'she' on this particular occasion, a 'she' since the person in question put herself in the third person by naming herself Manène, in a form which formed part of the unconscious, I am saying, since it is a 'she' who, as in my title for this year, a 'she' qui s'ailait à mourre who pretended to be a bearer of knowledge.

He or she, is the third person, is the Other, as I define it, it is the unconscious. It knows, in the absolute, and only in the absolute, it knows that I know what was in the letter, but that I alone know. In reality, it therefore knows nothing, except that I know it, but this is not a reason that I should tell him.

In fact, this Absolute Knowledge, I did more than allude to it somewhere, I really insisted on it with my big boots, namely, that the whole appendix that I added to my writing on The purloined letter, namely, what goes from page 54 to page 60, and that I entitled in part 'Parenthesis of parentheses', is very precisely this something which, here, is substituted by Bozef.

Alain Didier Weill, for his part, it is not that he substitutes himself, he identifies himself to Bozef. He feels himself, he feels himself in the Passe, it is rather curious that he could, in a way in this writing, find, as I might say, the call that answered for me, made me answer by the Passe.

The Real that is at stake, is the knot in its entirety. Since we are speaking about the Symbolic, it must be situated in the Real. There is, for this knot, a cord. The cord is also corps-de (body-of). This corps-de, is parasited on by the signifier; for the signifier though it forms part of the Real, it is indeed there that I am right to situate the Symbolic, one must think of the following, which is that we might well have dealings with this corps-de only in the dark. How could we recognise, in the dark, that it is a Borromean knot? That is what is at stake in the Passe. 'I know that he knows', what can that mean except to objectify the unconscious, except for the fact that the objectification of the unconscious necessitates a redoubling, namely, that 'I know that he knows that I know that he knows'. It is on this condition alone that analysis holds onto its status. This is what creates an obstacle to this something which, by limiting itself to 'I know that he knows', opens the door to occultism and telepathy. It is because of not having sufficiently grasped, sufficiently well grasped the status of anti-knowledge, namely, of the anti-unconscious, in other words of this pole, of this pole which consciousness is, that Freud allowed himself from time to time to be tickled by what have since been called 'psy' phenomena, namely, that he allowed himself to slip quite gently into delusion, in connection with the fact that Jones gave him his visiting card immediately after a patient had casually mentioned Jones' name.

The Passe that is at stake, I only envisaged in a tentative way, as something which means nothing but a 'recognising one another', if I can express myself in that way, on condition that we insert into it an 'a-v' after the first letter 'recognising one another between knowledge (se reconnaître entre s(av)oir)'. Are there tongues that are an obstacle to the recognition of the unconscious? This is something that was suggested to me as a question by the fact that this '*c'est to*i', in which would have Bozef communicating with the King in this moment, that he imputed to me quite wrongly, thanks to the fact that he picked up the term communion somewhere in my Ecrits. '*C'est to*i', are there tongues in which this could be a 'toi sait' of the verb savoir, namely, something which would put the toi, which would have it slip into the third person.

All of this to advance, to say that it is really divinatory that Alain Didier Weill was able to link what I call the Passe to The purloined letter. There is surely something worthwhile here, something that consists in the introduction of Bozef. Bozef walks around in it, as I really indicated in the very text of The purloined letter; as I really indicated – I talk all the time, on every page, of something which is on the point of happening, it even goes as far as being the point at which I end – that a letter always arrives at its destination, namely, that it is in short addressed to the King, and that is why it has to get to him. That, in all of this text, I speak of nothing but that, namely, of the imminence of the fact that the King gets to know about the letter, is this not to say, namely, to put forward, that he knows it already? Not alone does he know it already, but I would say that he 'recognises' it. Is not 'this recognition' very precisely what can ensure the behaviour of the Queen and King?

That is what I wanted to say to you today.

Seminar 8: Wednesday 8 March 1977

What one writes..., I say 'one', because – anyone at all can write – I say 'one' because it embarrasses me to say 'I'. It is not without reason that it embarrasses me. Why should the 'I' be produced on this particular occasion? Therefore it happens that I said and by that fact it can be found in writing, I said that there is no metalanguage, namely, that one cannot talk about language.

As it happens I reread something which is in Scilicet IV that I called, anyway that I entitled, that is how, it is something like that that carries your brand, anyway that I entitled L'étourdit, and in L'étourdit, I noticed, I recognised something, in L'étourdit, this metalanguage, I would say that I almost brought it to birth. Naturally that would mark an epoch. It would mark an epoch, but there is no epoch because there is no change. This almost that I added to my sentence, this almost underlines that it never happened. It is a semblance of metalanguage and since I make use in the text, I make use of this way of writing, *s'emble*r, s'emblant to metalanguage. Making a reflective verb of this s'embler, detaches it from this coming to fruition which being is, and as I write, il parest, parest means a s'emblant of being. There you are.

And then, in this connection, I notice that it was for a preface that I opened this writing, for a preface that I had to write for an Italian edition that I had promised, it is not sure that I will do it, it is not sure that I will do it because it annoys me, but I noticed in this connection, I consulted someone who is Italian for whom this tongue, that I understand nothing about, is his maternal tongue, I consulted someone who pointed out to me that there is something that resembles this s'embler, which resembles this s'embler, but which is not, which is not easy to introduce with the deformation in the way of writing that I give it. In short, it is not easy to transcribe, that is why I proposed that my preface should not be translated, after all, this all the more that there is no kind of inconvenience in translating anything whatsoever, in particular, not the preface.

Like every preface, I would be inclined, since this is usually what happens in prefaces, I would be inclined to approve myself, even to applaud myself; this is what is usually done. It is a comedy. It is of the order of comedy and that made me, that induced me..., that pushed me towards Dante. This comedy is divine, of course, but that only means one thing, which is that it is farcical. I speak about the farcical in L'étourdit, I don't know at what page I speak about it but I do speak about it. That means that one can be farcical about this supposedly divine work. There is not the slightest divine work, unless one wants to identify it to what I call the Real. But I want to specify this notion that I have of the Real.

I would like it to become more widespread. There is an aspect (face) – it is unheard of that one should dare to advance terms like that – there is an aspect by which this Real is distinguished from what is, to say the word, knotted to it. Here it is necessary to specify certain things. If one can talk about aspect, it must take on its weight, I mean that it should have a sense. It is quite clear that it is inasmuch as this notion of the Real that I am advancing, is something consistent that I can put it forward.

And there I would like to make a remark, which is that the rings of string, as I called them, in which I made consist this triad of the Real, of the Imaginary and of the Symbolic, to which I was pushed, not by just anyone, by the hysterics, so that that I started from the same material as Freud, since it is in order to say something coherent about hysterics that Freud built up the whole of his technique, which is a technique, namely, something that on this particular occasion is very fragile.

I would like all the same to point out the following, which is that the rings of string on this particular occasion do not hold up. Something more is needed – this is what was, I should say, suggested to me the other day by Soury's lecture; Soury gives lectures on Thursday evening, I don't see why I shouldn't tell you, at 7.15 at Jussieu and you can ask him where, I hope that many of the people who are here will go there – he pointed out to me very specifically that these rings of string only held up on condition of being something that must be called by its name, a torus. In other words, there are three tori; there are three tori which are necessary, because if they are not presupposed, one cannot demonstrate the fact that these tori are necessitated by the reversal of the aforesaid tori; in other words a torus, we are used to drawing it like that, naturally it is a completely inadequate drawing, since one does not see, unless one indicates it explicitly in this form, that it is a surface and not at all a bubble in a ball.

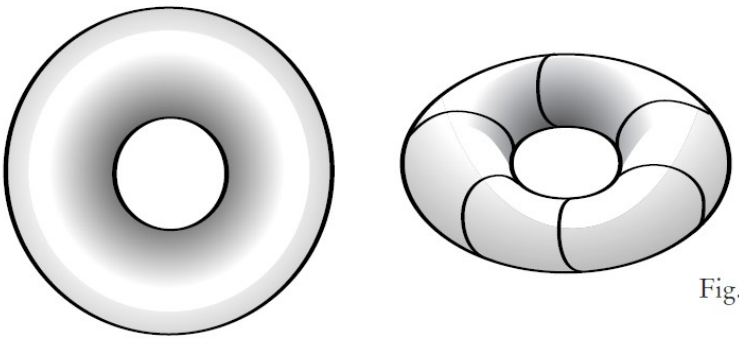

Fig. VIII-1

That this surface can be turned inside out, has properties from which it results – I once recalled that the torus can be turned inside out – from which it results that it is thanks to that that it appears, that turned inside out, the torus which for example is supposed to be one of three, this one for example, that when turned inside out the torus contains the two other rings of string which themselves ought to be represented by a torus, namely, that what you see here, which I drew in this way, ought, not to be drawn as I have just begun to draw it, but to be drawn like that namely, two other tori, and two other tori, are not two other rings of string. Does that mean that these three tori are Borromean knots? Absolutely not. For, if this is the way that you cut the torus which is for example the one that I have designated here (1), if that is the way you cut it, it does not free the two other tori. You have to cut it, as I might say to express myself in a metaphorical fashion, you have to cut it lengthways (2) for it to be freed. [cut 1, 2]

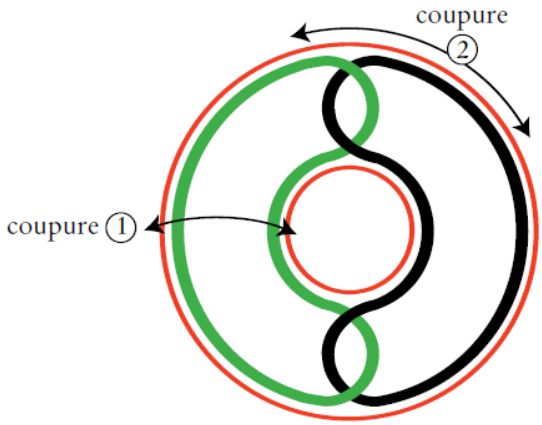

Fig. VIII-2

The condition therefore that the torus should only be cut in one single way, even though it could be done in two ways, is something that deserves to be remembered in what I would call on this occasion, not a metaphor but a structure; for the difference there is between the metaphor and the structure, is that the metaphor is justified by the structure.

Now in following what is at stake in the Dante in question, I was led to reread an old book that my bookseller brought me, since he comes from time to time to bring me things, it is by someone called Delescluze, which was published in 1864, he was a pal of Baudelaire, it is called Dante et la poésie amoureuse (Dante and love poetry) and it is not very reassuring; it is all the less reassuring in that as I said earlier, Dante had begun on this particular occasion, on the occasion of the aforesaid love poetry, began to act the buffoon.

He created, not what I have not created, namely, a metalanguage, he created what one can call a new tongue, what could be called a metatongue, since after all, every new tongue is a metatongue, but like all new tongues, it is formed on the model of ancient ones, which is to say that it fails.

What kind of fate is it which ensures that, whatever may be the genius of someone, he always recommences along the same rail, along this rail which means that the tongue fails, that, in short, it is a farcical tongue? The French tongue is no less farcical than the others, it is uniquely because we have a taste for it, have practiced it, that we consider it as superior. It has nothing superior about it in any way whatsoever. It is exactly like Algonquin or Coyote (sic), it is no better. If it were worth more, one might say of it what Dante enunciates somewhere, he enunciates this in something he wrote in Latin and he calls it Nomina sunt consequentia rerum.

The consequence, consequence meaning on this particular occasion what? It can only mean the real consequence, but there is no real consequence, since the Real, as I symbolised it by the Borromean knot, the Real vanishes into a dust cloud of tori because, of course, these two tori here inside the other are unknotted. They are unknotted and this means that the Real, at least in the way that we believe we can represent it, the Real is only linked by a structure, if we pose that structure, means nothing but the Borromean knot. The Real is in short defined as being incoherent insofar as it is precisely structure.

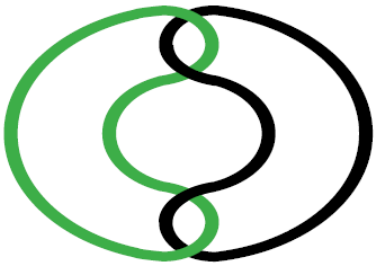

Fig. VIII-3

All of this does nothing more than specify the conception that someone, who happens on this particular occasion to be me, has of the Real. The Real does not constitute a universe, except by being knotted to two other functions. That is not reassuring, it is not reassuring because one of these functions is the living body.

We do not know what a living body is. It is an affair which for our part we have to leave to God. I mean that – insofar as what I am saying has a sense - what I mean is that I read a thesis which, bizarrely, was produced in 1943. Don't go looking for it, because you will never get your hands on it, you will never get your hands on it, because you are here much more numerous than the number of the copies of the thesis that came out, it is the thesis of someone called Madeleine Cavet who was born in 1908, the thesis specifies it, namely, about 7 years after me, and what she says is not foolish. She sees perfectly well that Freud, is something absolutely confused in which, as we say, a cat would not find its kittens. And she takes a measure, she evokes on this particular occasion the work of Pasteur.

Pasteur is a funny business. I mean that up to him – for after all it is from him that this comes – up to him people believed in what can be called spontaneous generation, namely, that people believed that, to abandon – here lay the apparent foundation – to abandon a living body, naturally things started to swarm all over it, I mean that it swarms with what are called micro-organisms, as a result of which people imagined that these micro-organisms could grow on anything whatsoever. It is quite certain that, if you leave a glass in the open air, there are things that fall into it and that even, on occasion, make what is called a culture. But what Freud demonstrated, what Pasteur demonstrated – this slip has all its value, given the sense of the thesis of the aforesaid Madeleine Cavet – what Pasteur demonstrated, is that, on condition simply of putting a little cotton wool at the mouth of a vase, things do not start to swarm inside and this is manifestly one of the simplest demonstrations of non-spontaneous generation.

But then that presupposes strange things. Where do these micro-organisms come from? We are reduced in our own day to thinking that they come from nowhere. It is as good as saying that it is God who fabricated them. It is very, very annoying that people should have abandoned this openness to spontaneous generation which was in short a rampart against the existence of God. For us, our friend Pasteur was moreover considered by the doctors of his time as a formidable cleric and this is quite true. He had religious convictions. People completely forget this adventure, this adventure of the aforesaid Pasteur, people forget it. People forget it and the fact of being reduced to thinking that there is life, more or less pulsating life on meteorites does not resolve the question. The fact that we do not find the slightest trace of life on the moon, or on Mars, does not help matters. For why, in the name of what, if not in the name of a being that must all the same be situated somewhere, of a being who might have done that explicitly like a man, as if man who, for his part, manipulates and fiddles with things, as if man all of a sudden had seen that there was an ape, an ape-God – I mean that God is supposed to ape him – as if everything in short started from that, which in fact loops the loop. Everyone knows that the ape-God, is more or less the idea that we can construct for ourselves of the idea and of the way in which man is born and that this is not something which is completely satisfying. For why does man have what I call parl'être, namely, this way of talking in such a fashion that nomina non sunt consequentia rerum, in other words that there is somewhere something which is not working in the structure as I conceive it, namely, the so called Borromean knot.

This is indeed the case, and it is worthwhile evoking by this name Borromean a historic date, namely, the way in which there was elucubrated the very idea in short of structure. It is altogether striking to see that this meant at the time that, if one family withdrew from a group of 3, the 2 others by that very fact found themselves free, free to no longer agree with one another. Of course, this sordid aspect of this history of the Borromeans is worthwhile recording.

Not alone are names not the consequence of things, but we can explicitly affirm the contrary. I have a grandson, I have a grandson called Luc – it is a funny idea, but it was his parents who baptised him – he is called Luc and he says quite appropriate things. He says, in short, that he strives to say words that he does not understand, and he deduces that this is what makes his head swell, because he has like me, - it is not surprising since he is my grandson – he has like me a big head. It is what is called, I am not properly speaking hydrocephalic, I have all the same a head, I have a head, and a head is characterised by the average, I have a rather big head, and my little grandson also and he makes the mistake obviously of thinking that, this way that he has of defining so well the unconscious – because that is what is at stake – this way that he has of defining so well the unconscious, this approach, namely, that the words entered into his head, he has deduced from that very fact that that is why he has a big head. It is a theory in short, that is not very intelligent, but pertinent in the sense that it is justified. There is something which all the same gives him the feeling that speaking is parasitic. So then he pushes that a little bit further to the extent of thinking that that is why he has a big head.

It is very difficult not to slip, on this particular occasion into the imaginary of the body, namely, the big head. The terrible thing is that it is logical and that logic on this particular occasion, is no small thing, namely, that it is the parasite of man. I said earlier that the universe did not exist, but is that true? Is it true that the One which is at the principle of the notion of the universe, that the One is capable of dissolving into powder, that the One of the universe is not one or is only one among others. Does the fact that there exists a One, imply just by itself the universal? This involves that one should say that, however excluded the universal may be, the foreclosure of this universal implies the maintenance of particularity. There exists a one is never put forward in logic except in a way that is coherent with what follows: there exists a one that satisfies the function. The logic of the function is in short what depends on the logic of the one. But this means at the same time, and this is what I try to draw somewhere on my graph, this graph that I risked a long time ago, on which like that so that no one would speculate about it, I wrote this something which is the signifier, the signifier of the fact that the Other does not exist, which I wrote like that: (Ø). But the Other, the Other in question, must indeed be called by its name Other, it is the sense, it is Other than the real.

It is very difficult not to waver on occasions. There is a choice to be made between actual infinity which can be circular, on condition that there is no origin that can be designated, and the enumerable knot, namely, finite.

There are many possibles in this which means that one interrupts the way of writing – that is my definition of the possible – one only continues it if one wishes; in fact one gives up, because it is always possible to give up, because it is even impossible not to really give up. What I call the impossible, is the Real, limits itself to non-contradiction. The Real is the impossible to simply write, or in other words, does not cease not to be written. The Real, is the possible waiting to be written.

And I should say that I had a confirmation of this, because I don't know why, something got into me, I went to Saclay, more exactly I asked someone to drive me there. It is someone called Goldzahl, it is amusing that he should have this name which means golden number; he brought me into a little room where there were traces – because Saclay is immense, it is absolutely enormous, you cannot imagine the number of people who are scribbling on paper inside it, there are 7,000 of them, all they do moreover is to scratch on paper, except for the few people who are there in this little room and thanks to which, there is seen, what bears witness to the functioning of most of these apparatuses – as a result of which one can see the undulating trace of what represents – of course it was necessary to set up the apparatuses in such a way that this functions, that it should be represented – of what represents the magnetism of the principle magnets. One sees on other apparatuses there being displaced, because one can qualify as displacement what goes from the left to the right and what is supported by a point; a point at the end of a line, that makes a trace and in this little room, one sees nothing but these traces whose structure it is in short conceivable to symbolise by something which goes around in the form of a circle each of these points, each of these points which represents a particle, a particle which therefore is articulated with all of the apparatuses of which it is quite certain that the totality of these apparatuses, is what is called psi, in other words what Freud could not prevent himself from marking as the initial of the psyche. If there were not these savants who looked after these particles, there would not be psarticules either and this forces our hand to think that, not alone is there the parl'être, but that there is also the psarl'être, in other words that all of this would not exist if there were not the functioning of this thing which is nevertheless so grotesque and is called thought.

Everything that I am saying to you there, has no more value I think than what my grandson recounts. It is rather annoying that the Real can only be conceived of as being improper. It is not quite the same as language. Language is only improper for saying anything whatsoever. The Real is only improper by being realised; according to the usage of the word to realise [in English] that means nothing other than to imagine as sense. There is one thing which is in any case certain, if indeed a thing can be so, it is that the very idea of the Real involves the exclusion of all sense. It is only insofar as the Real is emptied of sense, that we can grasp it a little which obviously brings me to not even give it the sense of the One, but one must hang on to something, and this logic of the One is indeed what remains, what remains as existence. There you are.

I am very annoyed at having conversed with you today in this kind of extreme. It is necessary all the same that this should take a different turn, I mean that to end up on the idea that the only thing that is Real is what excludes any kind of sense, is exactly the contrary of our practice. Where our practice is bathed in this kind of precise indication that, not simply names, but simply words have an import.

I do not know how to explain that. If the nomina do not depend in some way on things, how is psychoanalysis possible? Psychoanalysis would be in a certain way what one could call a sham, I mean a semblance. That is all the same how I supplied in the enunciation of my different discourses the only thinkable way of articulating what is called the psychoanalytic discourse.

I remind you that the place of semblance where I put the object...that the place of semblance is not where I articulated that of the Truth.

How can a subject, since that is how I designated the S with the bar, $, how can a subject, a subject with all its weakness, its debility, hold the place of the Truth and even ensure that this has results? He places himself in it in this way, namely, a Knowledge. [To be corrected, insert arrows and bars]

$$\mathbf{o} > S_2 \quad \text{(hesitation)} \quad \mathbf{o} > S_1$$
$$$ \quad S_i \qquad\qquad $ \quad S_2$$

Is it not like that that I wrote it at the time?

- J-A Miller: $ at the place of S_1, S_1 at the place of S_2 and S_2 at the place of $

$$\mathbf{o} > $$$
$$S_2 \quad S_1$$

- Lacan: - You see that it is easy to get confused with this!

Yes. Undoubtedly it is better like that. It is undoubtedly better like that, but it is still more troubling like that, I mean that the gap between S_1 and S_2 is more striking because there is something interrupted and that in short S_1, is only the beginning of knowledge; but a knowledge which is content to always commence, as they say, ends up at nothing. This indeed is why, when I went to Brussels, I did not speak about psychoanalysis in the best of terms. There are some that I recognise who were there.

Good. To commence to know in order not to arrive, is something which goes when all is said and done, rather well with what I call my lack of hope, but finally that implies a name, a term it remains for me to allow you to guess – the Belgian people who heard me speak in Brussels being free to share it with you or not.

Seminar 9: Wednesday 15 March 1977

There are people well intentioned towards me – and already that raises a mountain of problems: how account for the fact that people are well intentioned towards me? It is because they do not know me; for, as regards myself, I am not full of good intentions – in any case these well intentioned people have sometimes written letters tending... – in any case, it was written..., it was written that my stammerings the last time about the discourse that I call analytic, was a slip. They wrote that textually. What distinguishes a slip from gross error? I have all the more tendency, for my part, to classify as error, what is qualified as a slip, in that all the same I have spoken a little bit about this analytic discourse; when I speak, I imagine I am saying something. The annoying thing is that where I make a slip, or I am supposed to have made a slip, it was in material, as I might say, in written material that I made the slip. That takes on a particular importance when it is a matter of something written by someone - , me on this particular occasion - by someone who has been found out. Formerly I did happen to say, in imitation moreover of someone who was a celebrated painter: 'I do not seek, I find.' At the point that I am at, I do not so much find as search, in other words I go around in circles. This indeed is what happened in connection with this slip, the fact is that the letters written were not in the right direction (sens), in the direction that they turn, but were mixed up. It should all the same be clearly said that I did not make this slip altogether without reason, I mean that I certainly imagined the order in which the letters turned, but I think I know at least what I wanted to say.

I am going to try today to explain what. I am encouraged to do so by the hearing that I received last evening at the Ecole Freudienne from a Madame Kress-Rosen. I am not going to ask her to stand up, even though I can clearly see her. I even became quite concerned to know if she were among what are called the listeners (auditrices) and I do not see why I should put this term in the feminine, since that has no sense, that has no sense (sens), that has no valid sense.

Madame Kress-Rosen had the goodness to say last evening almost what I wanted to say to someone, whom there is no longer any question of my encountering, since it is a person that I asked to telephone me and who did not do so – it is someone who belongs to German radio, I don't know too well, in truth I do not even know her name, but she asked me, apparently on the advice of Roman Jakobson, to answer something about what concerns him.

My first feeling was to say that what I call linguisterie – Madame Kress-Rosen has given its destiny to this appellation – that what I called linguisterie requires psychoanalysis to be supported. I would add that there is no other linguistics than the one that I call linguisterie, which does not mean that psychoanalysis is the whole of linguistics, events prove this, namely, that people have been doing linguistics for a very long time since the Cratylus, since Donatus, since Priscianus, that people have always done it, and this moreover does not settle anything since I tended to say the last time – I noticed it in connection with this S_1 and this S_2 which are separated in the correct notation of what I called the psychoanalysis discourse. I think that after all you got some information from the Belgians, and that the fact that I spoke about psychoanalysis as being able to be a fraud, has reached your ears, I would even say that I insist on it in speaking about this S_1 which appears to promise an S_2.

It must all the same be remembered at that moment what I said concerning the subject, namely, the relationship of this S_1 with this S_2. I said, at one time, that a signifier was what represented the subject for another signifier. So then what can be deduced from that? I will all the same give you an indication, even if only to throw some light on my route because it is not self-evident. Psychoanalysis is perhaps a fraud, but it is not just any one whatsoever. It is a fraud that is quite correct with respect to what a signifier is. And the signifier, it should all the same be clearly noted is something very special; it has what people call sense- effects, and it would be enough for me to connote S_2, as not being the second in time, but as having a double direction (sens) for the S_1 to take its place, and its place correctly. It should all the same be said that the weight of this duplicity of sense is common to every signifier.

I think that Madame Kress-Rosen will not contradict me, if she wants to oppose it in any way whatsoever, she is quite free to make a sign to me, since, I repeat, I am delighted that she is there. Psychoanalysis, I would say, is no more of a fraud than poetry itself, and poetry is founded precisely on this ambiguity of which I speak and which I qualify as double sense. Poetry appears to me all the same to depend on the relation of the signifier to the signified. One could say in a certain way that poetry is imaginarily symbolic, I mean that, since Madame Kress-Rosen yesterday evoked Saussure and his distinction between the tongue and speech, not moreover without noting that as regards this distinction, Saussure had wavered; it remains all the same that his starting point, namely, that the tongue is the fruit of a maturation, of the ripening of something that is crystallised in usage, it remains that poetry depends on a violence done to this usage and that, - we have proofs of this – , if I evoked, the last time, Dante and love poetry, it is indeed to mark this violence, that philosophy does everything to efface, this indeed is why philosophy is the testing ground for swindling and why one cannot say that poetry does not play, in its own way, innocently, at what I called just now, what I connoted as imaginarily symbolic, that is called the Truth.

This is called the Truth notably concerning the sexual relationship, namely, that, as I put it, - perhaps the first, and I do not see why I would give myself a title for it – there is no sexual relationship, I mean properly speaking, in the sense that there might be something to ensure that a man necessarily recognises a woman.

It is certain that I, that I have this weakness of recognising her as the (la), but I am all the same sufficiently aware to have noted that there is no the, which coincides with my experience, namely, that I do not recognise all women. There is no such thing, but is all the same necessary to say that this is not self-evident; There is no such thing, unless it is incestuous – this is very exactly what Freud put forward – there is none such except incestuous, I mean that, - what Freud said -, the fact is that the Oedipus myth designates the following, that the only person that one wants to sleep with, is one's mother, and as regards the father, one kills him. It is even all the more probable that one knows neither who is your father and your mother, it is exactly why the myth of Oedipus has a sense; he killed someone that he did not know and he slept with someone that he had not the slightest idea was his mother, it is nevertheless like that that things happened according to the myth, and what that means, is that the only true thing is castration. In any case with castration, one is quite sure of escaping it, as all this so-called Greek mythology designates clearly for us, namely, that the father, it is not so much his murder which is at stake as his castration, that castration passes by way of murder and that, as regards the mother, the best thing that one can do with her, is to cut it off to be quite sure of not committing incest.

What I would like, is to give you the refraction of these truths in sense. One would have to manage to give an idea of a structure, which is such that it would incarnate sense in a correct way. Contrary to what is said, there is no truth about the Real, since the Real is sketched out as excluding sense. It would be still too much to say, that there is something of the Real, because, to say that, is already to suppose a sense. The word Real has itself a sense, I even at one time, played a little bit on it, I mean to invoke the things, I evoked as an echo the word reus which, as you know, in Latin means guilty; one is more or less guilty of the Real. This indeed is why moreover psychoanalysis is a serious thing, I mean that it is not absurd to say that it can slide into fraudulence.

There is something that must be noted in passing, which is that, as I pointed out the last time to Pierre Soury – the last time, I mean in his own place, at Jussieu, the one of which I spoke to you the last time – I pointed out to him that the reversible torus from which he approaches the Borromean knot is something which, for the knot in question, presupposes that one single torus is reversed. Not at all, of course, that one cannot reverse others, but then it is no longer a Borromean knot. I gave you an idea of that by a little drawing the last time.

It is therefore not surprising to enunciate in connection with this torus, with this torus which starts from a triple Borromean knot, with this torus if you reverse it, to qualify what is in the torus, in the torus of the Symbolic, as symbolically real. The symbolically real is not the really symbolic, for the really symbolic is the Symbolic included in the Real. The Symbolic included in the Real has well and truly a name, it is called the lie, whereas the symbolically real – I mean that which of the Real is connoted inside the Symbolic – this is what is called anxiety. The symptom is real; it is even the only real thing, namely, which has a sense, which preserves a sense in the Real. It is indeed for that reason that the psychoanalyst can, if he is lucky, intervene symbolically to dissolve it in the Real.

So then I am going to all the same note for you in passing what is symbolically imaginary. Well then, it is geometry; the famous mos geometricus, that so much has been made of, is the geometry of angels, namely, something which despite writing does not exist. I formerly teased the Reverend Father Teilhard de Chardin, a good deal by pointing out to him that if he was so keen on writing, he should recognise that angels existed. Paradoxically Reverend Father Teilhard de Chardin did not believe in them, he believed in man, hence his business about the hominisation of the planet. I do not see why one would believe more in the hominisation of anything whatsoever than in geometry. Geometry explicitly concerns the angels and for the rest, namely, as regards structure, there reigns only one thing, which is what I call inhibition. It is an inhibition that I attack, I mean that I worry about, I concern myself about everything that I bring you here as structure, a concern which is simply linked to the fact that a genuine geometry is not what one thinks, one that depends on pure spirits, as much as one that has a body, that is what we mean when we speak about structure, and to put that for you in black and white, I am going to show you what is at stake when one speaks about structure.

It is a matter of something like that, namely, a holed torus – this I owe to Pierre Soury – I mean that it is easy to complete this torus; you clearly see that here there is, as one might say, the edge, if one can express oneself in this way, so imprecisely, the edge of the hole which is in the torus and that all of that is the body of the torus. [Fig IX-1, IX-2].

Fig. IX-1

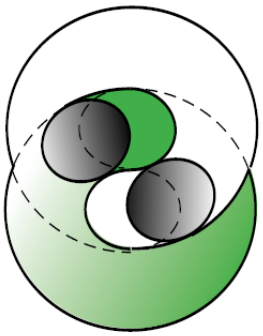

Fig. IX-2

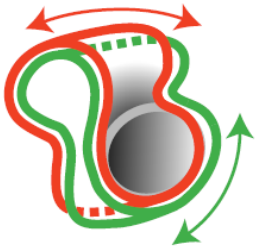
It is not enough to draw this torus like that. For one sees that by holing this torus at the same time one makes a hole in another torus. This is what is proper to the torus, for it is just as legitimate to draw the hole here and to make the torus which is, as I might say, linked with that one. This indeed is why one can say that by holing a torus, one holes at the same time another torus which is the one which has with it a chain-like relationship.

So then I am going to depict for you what one can draw here in terms of a structure which you see that by drawing it in two colours, I think it is sufficiently evident that here, namely, the green in question, is inside the red torus; but that on the contrary here you can see that the second torus is outside. But that is not a second torus, since what is at stake is always the same figure, but a figure which shows itself able to slide inside what I will call the red torus, which slides while turning and which realises this torus linked to the first one.

If we make this green one turn, this green one which is found to be at the outside surface of the red torus if we make it turn, it is going to find itself here represented by its own sliding and what we can say of the one and of the other, is that the green torus is very precisely what we can call the complement of the other torus, namely, the linked torus. [Fig. IX-3].

Fig. IX-3



But suppose that it is the red torus that we make slide in that way. What we obtain, is the following, it is something which is going to find itself realised inversely, that something which is empty is knotted to something which is empty, namely, that what is there is going to appear there; in other words what I pre-suppose by this manipulation is that, far from us having two concentric things, we will have on the contrary two things which operate on one another.

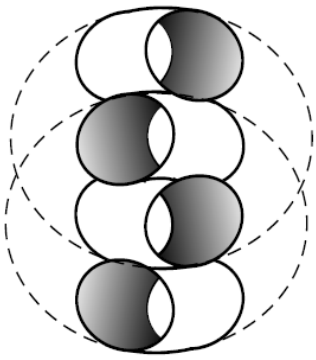


Fig. IX-4

And what I want to designate by that, is something that I was questioned about when I spoke about full speech and empty speech. I clarify it now. Full speech, is the speech full of sense. Empty speech is one that has only meaning. I hope that Madame Kress-Rosen whose bright smile I can still see, does not see too great an inconvenience in that, I mean by that that speech can be at the same time full of sense, it is full of sense - because it starts from this duplicity drawn here – it is because the word with a double sense, which is S_2, that the word sense is itself full. When I spoke about Truth, it is to sense that I refer; but what is proper to poetry when it fails, is precisely to have only a meaning, to be a pure knot of one word to another word. It nevertheless remains that the willingness for sense consists in eliminating the double sense, which can only be conceived by realising, as I might say, this cut, namely, to ensure that there is only sense, the green overlapping the red on this particular occasion.

How can a poet realise this tour de force of ensuring that one sense is absent? It is, of course, by replacing this absent sense, by what I called meaning. Meaning is not at all what foolish people believe, as I might say. Meaning is an empty word, in other words it is that which, in connection with Dante, is expressed in the qualification given to his poetry, namely, that it is love poetry. Love is nothing but a meaning, namely, that it is empty and one can see clearly the way in which Dante incarnates this meaning. Desire has a sense, but love as I already pointed out in my seminar on Ethics, as courtly love supports it, is only a meaning.

There you are. I will be content to tell you what I told you today, since moreover I do not see why I should insist.

Seminar 10: Wednesday 19 April 1977

I have a little bit of trouble today, I have a sore back, so that standing up does not help me. But when I am sitting down I am still sore. Because one does not know what is intentional is certainly not a reason for speculating about what is supposed to be so.

The Ego, because that is what it is called – it is called that in Freud's second topography – the Ego is supposed to have intentions, this from the fact that there is attributed to it what it chatters about, what is called its saying. In effect, it says; it says and it says imperatively. It is at least like that that it begins to express itself.

The imperative, is what I supported, let us say, with a signifier with the index 2, S_2; this signifier index 2 by which I defined the subject, I said that a signifier is what represents the subject for another signifier. In the case of the imperative, it is the one who listens who, by this fact, becomes subject. That does not mean that the one who utters it does not become, for his part also a subject incidentally. Yes. I would like (je voudrais) to draw your attention to something, there is nothing in psychoanalysis except these I would like's. I am obviously a psychoanalyst who has a little too much experience, but it is true that the psychoanalyst, at the point that I have got to, depends on the reading that he makes of his analyser, of what his analyser says to him in so many words. Can you hear me, because after all I am not sure that this megaphone is functioning? Is it functioning...in the...Huh? Yes? Good. What his analyser believes he is saying to him, means that everything that the analyst listens to cannot be taken, as people say, literally (au pied de la letter). Here I must make a parenthesis, I said the tendency that this letter, whose foot (pied) indicates the attachment to the earth, which is a metaphor, a lame metaphor, which goes well with the foot, the tendency that this letter has of rejoining the Real, is his business; the Real in my notation being what it is impossible to rejoin. What his analyser, believes he is saying to the analyst in question, has nothing to do – and that, Freud noticed – has nothing to do with the truth. Nevertheless we must indeed think that to believe, is already something that exists, he says what he believes to be true. What the analyst knows, is that he is only speaking approximately about what is true, because he knows nothing about the True. Freud here, is delusional, and just enough so, for he imagines that True, is what he calls, for his part, the traumatic kernel. This is how he formally expresses himself, namely, that in the measure that the subject enunciates something closer to his traumatic kernel, this so called kernel, and which has no existence, it is only its prostitute (roulure) that the analyser is just like his analyst, namely, as I pointed out in invoking my grandson, the learning that he has undergone of one tongue among others, which for him is lalangue that I write, as you know, in a single word, in the hope of fitting (ferrer), the tongue itself, which equivocates with faire-réel (making real).

Lalangue whatever it is, is an obscenity. It is what Freud designates as – pardon me here for the equivocation - l'obrescène, it is also what he calls the other stage, the one that language occupies because of what is called its structure, elementary structure which is summarised in that of kinship.

I point out to you that there are sociologists who have enunciated under the patronage of someone called Robert Needham, who is not the Needham who has busied himself with so much care with Chinese science, but another Needham – the Needham of Chinese science is not called Robert – this one, the Needham in question, imagines that he is doing better than the others by making the remark, which is moreover correct, that kinship is to be questioned, namely, that it involves in fact something else, a much greater variety, a much greater diversity than that which, – it has to be clearly said, this is what he refers to – than what the analysers say about it. But what is quite striking, is that the analysers, for their part, speak only of that, so that the incontestable remark that kinship has different values in different cultures, does not prevent the resifting by the analysers of their relationship with their relations, moreover, it must be said, their next of kin, is a fact that the analyst has to support. There is no example that an analyser notes the specificity, the particularity which differentiates from other analysers, his relationship with his more or less immediate kin.

The fact that he talks only of that, is in a way something that chokes up all the nuances of its specific relation, so that La parenté en question (Kinship in question) – this is a book published by Seuil – that the kinship in question highlights this primordial fact that it is lalangue which is at stake. It has not at all the same consequences if the analyser talks only of that because his close relations have taught him lalangue, he does not differentiate what specifies his own particular relation with his close relations. It would be necessary to perceive that what I will call on this occasion the function of truth, is in a way deadened by something prevalent, and it must be said that culture is here stifled, deadened, and that on this particular occasion, one would do perhaps better to evoke the metaphor, since culture is also a metaphor, the metaphor of the agri of the same name. It would be necessary to substitute for the agri in question the term of cultural soup, it would be better to call culture a soup of language.

What does it mean to free associate? I am striving here to push things a little bit further. What does it mean to free associate? Is it a guarantee – it seems all the same to be a guarantee – that the subject who enunciates is going to say something which has a little bit more value? But in fact everyone knows that rationalisation, what is called that in psychoanalysis, that rationalisation has a greater weight than reasoning. What have what are called enunciations to do with a true proposition? One would have to try, as Freud enunciates, to see on what is founded this something, as Freud enunciates, to see on what is founded this something, which only functions by attrition, from which the Truth is supposed. One would have to see, to open oneself up to the dimension of truth as variable varité, namely, of what, in condensing like that these two words, I would call the varité, with the little silent é, the varité.

For example, I am going to pose something which has indeed its price. If an analysing subject slips into his discourse a neologism, like the one I have just made for example in connection with varité, what can one say about this neologism? There is all the same something that one can say, which is that the neologism appears when it is written. And it is precisely why that does not mean, like that, automatically, that it is the Real; it is not because it is written, that this gives the weight to what I evoked earlier in connection with au pied de la lettre.

In short, one must all the same raise the question of whether psychoanalysis,- I beg your pardon, at least I beg the pardon of psychoanalysts – is not what one could call an autism à deux? There is already a thing which allows this autism to be forced, this precisely that lalangue is a common affair and it is precisely there that I am, namely, capable of making myself understood by everybody here, this is where the guarantee is – this is why indeed I put on the agenda the transmission of psychoanalysis – this indeed is the guarantee that psychoanalysis does not limp irreducibly from what I called just now autism à deux.

People speak about the ruse of reason; it is a philosophical idea. It was Hegel who invented that. There is not the slightest ruse of reason. There is nothing constant, contrary to what Freud enunciates somewhere, that the voice of reason was low, but that it always repeated the same thing. It only repeats things by going around in circles. In order to say things, reason repeats the symptom. And the fact that today I have to present myself before you with what is called a physical sinthome, does not prevent you from asking quite rightly whether it is not intentional, whether for example I have not got into such stupid behaviour that my symptom, however physical it may be, may be something all the same wished for by me. There is no reason to stop in this extension of the symptom because it is something suspect, whether one likes it or not. Why should this symptom not be intentional?

It is a fact that l'élangue, I am writing that élangue, is elongated by translating one into the other, but the only knowledge remains the knowledge of tongues, that kinship is not translated in fact, but the only thing it has in common is the fact that analysers talk only about that. It has even got to the point that what I call on occasion an old analyst is tired of it.

Why did Freud not introduce something that he would call the lui (him)? When I wrote my little yoke there, in order to talk to you, I made a slip – another one! – instead of writing comme moi – this comme moi was not especially benevolent, it was a matter of what I would call mental debility, - I made a slip, at the place of comme moi I wrote comme ça. To write – since all of that is written, that is even what constitutes saying – to write that the analyser gets on as best he can with me also means me with him. That analysis talks only about the Ego and the Id, never of Lui, is all the same very striking. Lui nevertheless, is a term which should be required, and if Freud disdains taking note of it, it is indeed, it must be said, because he is egocentric, and even super-egocentric! That is what he is sick of. He has all the vices of the master, he understands nothing about anything. For the only master, it has to be said, is consciousness, and what he says about the unconscious is only confusion and entanglement, namely, a return to this mixture of crude drawings and of metaphysics which are never there without one another.

Every painter is above all a metaphysician, a metaphysician that he is due to the fact that he makes crude drawings. He is a dauber, hence the titles that he gives to his paintings. Even abstract art is titled (se titrise) like the others – I did not want to say entitled (titularisé) because that would mean nothing – even abstract art has titles, titles that it strives to make as empty as it can, but all the same it gives itself titles.

Without that, Freud would have drawn the consequences of what he says himself that the analyser does not know his truth, since he cannot say it. Which I defined as not ceasing to be written, namely, the symptom, is an obstacle to it. I am coming back to it. What the analyser says while waiting to be verified, is not the truth, it is the varité of the symptom. One must accept the conditions of the mental in the first rank of which is debility, which means the impossibility of holding a discourse against which there is no objection, no mental one precisely.

The mental is discourse. One does one's best to arrange for discourse to leave traces. This is the business of the Entwurf, of Freud's Project, but memory is uncertain. What we know, is that there are lesions of the body that we cause, of the body described as living, which suspend memory or at least do not allow us there to count on the traces one attributes to it when the memory of discourse is at stake.

Objections must be raised to the practice of psychoanalysis. Freud was a mental defective, like everyone, and like me myself on this particular occasion, in particular besides, neurotic, a sexual obsessional as has been said. It is hard to see why an obsession with sexuality would not be as valid as any other, since for the human species sexuality is quite rightly obsessive. It is in effect abnormal in the sense that I defined; there is no sexual relationship. Freud, namely, a case, had the merit of seeing that neurosis was not structurally obsessional, that it was fundamentally hysterical, namely, linked to the fact that there was no sexual relationship, that there are people disgusted by it, which is all the same a sign, a positive sign, is that it makes them vomit.

Sexual relationship must be reconstituted by a discourse, namely, something which has a quite different finality. What discourse is useful for from the outset, it serves to order, I mean to convey the commandment that I allow myself to call the intention of the discourse, because there remains something of the imperative in every intention. Every discourse has an effect of suggestion. It is hypnotic. The contamination of discourse by sleep is worth highlighting, before being highlighted by what one can call intentional experience, in other words taken as a commandment imposed on facts. A discourse is always soporific, except when one does not understand it. Then it wakes you up.

Laboratory animals are wounded not because one harms them more or less, they are woken up, completely, because they do not understand what is wanted of them, even if people stimulate their supposed instinct. When you make rats move in a little box, you stimulate their alimentary instinct, as it is put; it is quite simply hunger that is at stake. In short, awakening is the Real in its aspect of the impossible, which is only written by force or through force what is called counter-nature.

Nature, like every notion that comes to our minds, is an excessively vague notion. To tell the truth, counter-nature is clearer than the natural. The pre-Socratics, as they are called, had a penchant for counter-nature. This is the whole reason why attributing culture to them is deserved. They had to be gifted to force a little the discourse, the imperative saying which we have seen puts people to sleep.

Does truth waken up people or put them to sleep? That depends on the tone in which it is said. Spoken poetry is soporific. I take advantage of this to show the thing that François Cheng thought up. In reality he is called Cheng Tai-tchen. He put in François like that, as a way of being reabsorbed into our culture, which has not prevented him from maintaining very firmly what he says. And what he says, is L'écriture poétique chinoise (Chinese poetic writing), which is published by Seuil and I would really like you to follow the grain of it, follow the grain of it, if you are a psychoanalyst, which is not the case for everyone here.

If you are a psychoanalyst, you will see that these forcings by which a psychoanalyst can make something else ring out, something other than sense, for sense, is what resonates with the help of the signifier; but what resonates, does not go very far, it is rather flabby. Sense deadens things, but with the help of what one can call poetic writing, you can get the dimension of what one could call analytic interpretation.

It is quite certain that writing is not that by which poetry, the resonance of the body is expressed. It is all the same quite striking that the Chinese poets express themselves by writing and that for us, what is necessary, is that we should hold onto the notion, in Chinese writing, of what poetry is, not at all that all poetry – I am talking especially about ours – that all poetry is such that we can imagine it by writing, by poetic Chinese writing; but perhaps, you will sense something in it, something which is different than what ensures that Chinese poets cannot do otherwise than write. There is something that gives the feeling that they are not reduced there, the fact is that they sing, that they modulate, the fact is that there is what François Cheng enunciated before me, namely, a tonic counterpoint, a modulation which ensures that that it is sung, for from tonality to modulation there is a slippage. That you are inspired eventually by something of the order of poetry to intervene, is indeed why I would say, it is indeed something towards which you must turn, because linguistics is all the same a science that I would say is very badly orientated. If linguistics raises itself up, it is in the measure that a Roman Jakobson frankly tackles the questions of poetics. Metaphor, and metonymy, have an import for interpretation only insofar as they are capable of functioning as something else. And this other thing that they function as, is indeed that by which sound and sense are closely united.

It is in as much as a correct interpretation extinguishes a symptom, that the truth is specified as being poetic. It is not from the angle of articulated logic – even though on occasion I slip into it – it is not from the angle of articulated logic that we must sense the import of our saying, not at all of course that there is something which deserves to have two aspects. What we enunciate always, because it is the law of discourse, what we always enunciate as a system of opposition, is the very thing that we have to surmount, and the first thing would be to extinguish the notion of the Beautiful.

We have nothing beautiful to say. A different resonance is at stake, one founded on the witticism. A witticism is not beautiful, it depends only on an equivocation, or, as Freud said, on an economy. Nothing is more ambiguous than this notion of economy. But all the same, economy founds value. A practice without value is what we must establish.

Seminar 11: Wednesday 10 May 1977

I am racking my brains, which is already annoying, because I am seriously racking them; but the most annoying thing, is that I don't know what I am racking my brains about. There is someone named Gödel, who lives in America and who has enunciated the name undecidable. What is solid in this enunciation, is that he demonstrates that there are things that are undecidable. And he demonstrates it on what terrain? On what I would qualify like that, as the most mental of all the mentals, I mean in what is the most mental, the mental par excellence, the high point of the mental, namely, what can be counted: what can be counted is arithmetic. I mean that it is arithmetic that develops the countable. It is a question of knowing whether there are One's which are un-enumerable; this is at least what Cantor put forward. But this remains all the same doubtful; given that we know nothing except the finite, and that the finite is always enumerable.

Does this mean that the mental is weak? It is simply the weakness of what I call the Imaginary. The Unconscious was identified by Freud – we do not know why – the Unconscious was identified by Freud to the mental. This at least is what results from the fact that the mental is woven of words, between which, - it is explicitly, it seems to me, the definition that Freud gives of it – between which bévues are always possible. Hence my enunciation, that in terms of the Real there is only the impossible. This indeed is where I come to grief: is the Real impossible to think about? If it does not cease, - but here there is a nuance –, I do not enunciate that, it does not cease not to say itself, if only because the Real, I name it as such, but I say, that it does not cease not to be written.

Everything that is mental, when all is said and done, is what I write by the name of 'sinthome', s.i.n.t.h.o.m.e., namely, sign.

What does sign mean? This is what I am racking my brains about. Can one say that negation is a sign? I formerly tried to pose what is involved in the agency of the letter. Is one saying everything by saying that the sign of negation, which is written like that, [Frege's sign for negation] should not be written? What does it mean to deny? What can one deny? This plunges us into the Verneinung of which Freud has put forward the essentials. What he enunciates, is that negation presupposes a Bejahung. It is starting from something that is enunciated as positive, that one writes negation. In other words, the sign is to be sought – and this indeed is what, in this agency of the letter, that I posed – is to be sought as congruence of the sign to the Real.

What is a sign that one cannot write? For one really writes this sign. I highlighted like that, at one time, the pertinence of what the French lalangue touches on as adverb. Can one say that the Real lies (ment)? In analysis, one can surely say that the True lies. Analysis is a long journey (cheminement) – one finds it everywhere – that the chemine-ne-mente (the journey does not lie) it is something which can only on occasion signal to us that, as in the wire of the telephone, that we find our footing.

And then, that such things can be put forward poses the question of what is sense. Is sense supposed to be only lying, since one can say that the notion of the Real excludes – which should be written in the subjunctive – that it excludes (qu'elle exclue) sense? Does that indicate that it also excludes the lie? This indeed is what we have to deal with, when we wager in short on the fact that the Real excludes – in the subjunctive, but the subjunctive is the indication of the modal – what is modulated in this modal that would exclude (excluerait) the lie? In truth, - we sense it clearly -, there is nothing in all of that but paradoxes.

Are paradoxes representable? Doxa, is opinion, the first thing on which I introduced a lecture, at the time of what one can call or that one could call my beginnings, it is in the Meno in which it is enunciated that doxa, is true opinion. There is not the slightest true opinion, since there are paradoxes. This is the question that I am raising, whether paradoxes are or are not representable, I mean depictable (dessinables). The principle of true saying, is negation, and my practice, since there is a practice, a practice about which I question myself, is that, that I slide, I have to slide, because that is the way it is constructed, between the transference, that is called, I do not know why, negative, but it is a fact that it is called that. It is called negative because people clearly sense that there is something, we still do not know what positive transference is, positive transference, is what I tried to define under the name of subject supposed to know. Who is supposed to know? It is the analyst. It is an attribution, as is already indicated by the word supposed; an attribution is only a word; there is a subject, something which is underneath which is supposed to know. To know is therefore its attribute. There is only one problem, which is that it is impossible to give the attribute of knowing to anyone.

The one who knows, is, in analysis, the analyser, what he unfolds, what he develops, is what he knows, except for the fact that it is an Other, - but is there an Other? -, that it is an Other who follows what he has to say, namely, what he knows. The notion of the Other, I marked in a certain graph with a bar which breaks it, Ø. Does that mean that when broken it is denied? Analysis, properly speaking, enunciates, that the Other is nothing but this duplicity.

There is something of the One (Y a de l'Un), but there is nothing other. The One, as I have said, the One dialogues all alone, since it receives its own message in an inverted form. It is he who knows, and not the one supposed to know.

I put forward also this something which is enunciated about the universal, and this to deny it; I said that there is no all (tous). This indeed is why women, are more man than men. They are not-all (pas-toutes), as I said. These all therefore, have no common trait; they have nevertheless this one, this single common trait, the trait that I described as unary. They are comforted by the One. There is something of the One, I repeated it just now to say that there is something of the One, and nothing else. There is something of the One, but that means that there is all the same some kind of feeling. This feeling that I called, according to the unaries (unarités) that I called the support, the support of what indeed I must recognise, hatred, insofar as this hatred is akin to love; la mourre that I wrote in – I must all the same finish on this – that I wrote in my title for this year: l'insu que sait, what? de l'une-bévue. There is nothing more difficult to grasp than this trait of the une bévue. This bévue – is that by which I translate Unbewusst, namely, the Unconscious. In German, that means unconscious, but translated by une bévue, it means something completely different, that means a stumbling, a tripping up, a slipping from word to word, and this indeed is what is at stake when we use the wrong key to open a door which precisely this key does not open. Freud hastens to tell us that we thought that it opened this door but that we were mistaken. Bévue is indeed the only sense that remains for this consciousness. Consciousness has no other support than to permit a bévue. It is very disturbing because this consciousness strongly resembles the Unconscious, since it is what we say is responsible, responsible for all the bévue's that make us dream. Dream in the name of what? Of what I called the o-object, namely, that by which by the subject, who, essentially, is divided, barred, namely, still more barred than the Other.

This is what I am racking my brains about. I am racking my brains and I think that when all is said and done psychoanalysis, is, is what seems true (fait vrai), but how must one understand this seems true? It is an effort at sense, but it is a sens-blance (sens blant). There is the whole distance that I designated between S_2 to what it produces. It is of course the analyser who produces the analyst, there is no doubt about that. And that is why I question myself about what is involved in this status of the analyst to whom I leave this place of seeming true, of semblance, and of whom I consider, that it is moreover, there where you have seen it formerly, there is nothing easier than to slip into the bévue, I mean into an effect of the Unconscious, since it was indeed an effect of my unconscious, which means that you were good enough to consider a slip, and not as what I wanted to qualify myself, namely, the next time as a crude error. [Bars and arrow]

$$\begin{matrix} \mathbf{o} & > & $ \\ S_2 & & S_1 \end{matrix}$$

What effect does this subject, divided subject have if the S_1, the signifier indexed 1, S index 1, is found in our tetrahedron, since what I stressed, is that, in this tetrahedron, one of its links is always broken, namely, that the S index 1 does not represent the subject for S index 2, namely, of the Other. The S index 1 and the S index 2, is very precisely what I designated by the divided O of which I made a signifier S(Ø).

This indeed is the way in which the famous Unconscious presents itself. This Unconscious, is, when all is said and done, impossible to grasp. It does not represent, - I spoke earlier about paradoxes as being representable, namely, depictable – there is no possible depiction of the Unconscious. The Unconscious is limited to an attribution, to a substance, to something that is supposed to be beneath and what psychoanalysis enunciates, is very precisely the following, that it is only, I say, a deduction, a supposed deduction, nothing more. That with which I tried to give it body with the creation of the Symbolic has very precisely this destiny which is that this does not arrive at its destination.

How does it happen nevertheless that it is enunciated? That is the central introduction of psychoanalysis. I will stick with that for today. I hope to be able in a week's time, since there will be a 17 May, - God knows why! – anyway it has been announced to me that there will be a 17 May, and that here I have not too many examinees, unless it is you that I will examine and perhaps I will question in the hope that something of what I say have got across. Au revoir!

Seminar 12: 17 May 1977

People in the middle were not able to hear me; I would like to be told this time whether I can be heard. It is not because what I have to say is of extreme importance. Can you hear me? Would someone mind telling me if, perchance, I cannot be heard?

Good. So then to say things in order of growing importance, I had the pleasure of noticing that my teaching has reached l'Echo des Savanes! (laughter). I will only quote two lines for you: 'Psychoanalysis is no more complicated than that; anyway, that's Lacan's theory'. There you are. L'Echo des Savanes, number 30, in which you can read this text is all the same a little bit porno (laughter). That I have succeeded – indeed I have succeeded..., I did not do it deliberately – that I should have succeeded to going as far as porno, is all the same what can be called a success! Good. There you are. I am always careful to get l' Echo des Savanes as if I was only waiting for that, but it is obviously not the case. So then in order of growing importance, I am going all the same to signal for you the publication by Seuil of a text called Polylogue, which is by Julia Kristeva. I really like this text, it is a collection of a certain number of articles. It is no less precious for that. I would all the same like to be informed, by Julia Kristeva, since she has made the effort, this morning, to be good enough to put herself out, how she conceives of this Polylogue. I would really like her to tell me whether this Polylogue, as perhaps anyway it appears to me insofar as I was able to read it – because I did not get it too long ago – if this Polylogue is a polylinguisterie, I mean whether linguistics is there in some sort of way – what I believe is that it is, as far as I can see - , more than scarce, is that what she meant by Polylogue? She is moving her head up and down in a way that appears to approve me, but if she had still has enough voice to give a little yelp, I would all the same not be displeased. It is?..

J. Kristeva: It is something other than linguistics. It passes by way of linguistics, but it is not that.

J. Lacan: Yes. Only the annoying thing is that one only ever passes by way of linguistics. I mean that one passes by way of it, and if I enunciated something valid, I regret that people cannot base themselves on it. To tell the truth, I don't know, I heard it said by someone who came like that to pull my sleeve, that Jakobson wanted me to participate in an interview. I am very embarrassed and I feel myself completely incapable of doing so. It is not that...and nevertheless I have, as Julia Kristeva has just said, I have been through it. There you are.

I have been through it, but I have not remained there. I am still at the stage of interrogating psychoanalysis about the way in which it functions. What ensures that it holds up, that it constitutes a practice that is sometimes effective? Naturally there, one must all the same go through a series of interrogations. Does psychoanalysis work, since from time to time it does work, does it work by what people call an effect of suggestion? For the effect of suggestion to hold up, pre-supposes that language, - here I am repeating myself -, that language depends on what is called man. It is not for nothing that at one time, I manifested a certain, like that, preference for a certain book by Bentham which talks about the usefulness of fictions. Fictions are orientated toward service, which is...that he justifies in short. But on the other hand, there is a gap; that this depends on man, presupposes that we should clearly know, that we should know sufficiently what man is. All that we know about man is that he has a structure; but it is not easy to say what this structure is. Psychoanalysis has given a few squeaks about this subject, namely, that man leans towards his pleasure, which has a quite clear sense. What psychoanalysis calls pleasure, is to suffer, is to suffer the least possible. Here all the same one should remember the fashion in which I defined the possible, this has a curious reversal-effect, since I said that the possible is what ceases to be written. That is how at least I clearly articulated it, at the time when I was speaking about the possible, about the contingent, about the necessary and the impossible. So then if one transports the word the least, like that, quite clumsily, quite brutally, well then that means what ceases to be the least written. And in effect, that does not cease in an instant. Here indeed is where I would like to pose again a question to my dear Julia Kristeva. What does she call – that is going to force her to get out a little bit more from this quiet voice like earlier – what does she call the metatongue (metalangue)?

What does the metatongue mean if not translation? One can only speak of a tongue in another tongue, it seems to me, if what I said formerly is a fact, namely, that there is no metalanguage. There is an embryo of metalanguage; but one always skids away from it, for a simple reason, which is that I know nothing about language except a series of incarnated tongues. People strive to reach language by writing. And writing only produces something in mathematics, namely, there where people operate by formal logic, namely, by the extraction of a certain number of things that one defines, that one defines principally as axiom, and that one only operates quite brutally by extracting these letters, for they are letters.

Yeah, this is not at all a reason for people to believe that psychoanalysis leads one to write one's memoirs. It is precisely because there is no memoir of a psychoanalysis that I am so embarrassed. There is no memoir, that does not mean that memory is not involved in this affair. But to write one's memoirs is a different matter. Everything depends on a metaphor, namely, that people imagine that memory, is something which is imprinted; but there is nothing to say that this metaphor is valid. In his project, Entwurf, Freud articulates very precisely, the impression of what remains in memory. Because we know that animals remember is not a reason that it should be the same for man.

What I enunciate in any case, is that the invention of a signifier is something different to memory. It is not that the child invents; he receives this signifier, and this is even what would make it worthwhile to make more of them. Why would we not invent a new signifier? Our signifiers are always received. A signifier for example which would not have, like the Real, any kind of sense. We do not know, it would perhaps be fruitful. It would perhaps be fruitful, it would perhaps be a means, a means of shocking, in any case. It is not that people do not try. That is even what the witticism consists of, it consists in using one word for another usage than the one for which it is made. In the case of famillionnaire, one crumples this word; but it is not in this crumpling that its operational effect consists.

In any case there is a thing that I risked operating in the sense of a metatongue, the metatongue about which just now I was interrogating Julia Kristeva. The metatongue in question consists in translating Unbewusst, by une-bévue, this has absolutely not the same sense; but it is a fact, the fact is that once a man is asleep, he une-bévue' s at full tilt, and without there being any inconvenience, apart from the case of somnambulism. Somnambulism is inconvenient, when one wakens when one wakens the somnambulist, if he is walking on the rooftops, he may have an attack of vertigo, but in truth the mental illness which is the Unconscious does not wake up. What Freud enunciated and what I want to say, is the following: that in no case is there an awakening. Science, for its part, can only be indirectly evoked on this occasion, it is an awakening, but a difficult and suspect awakening. It is not sure that one is awake, unless what is presented and represented has, as I have said, no kind of sense. Now everything that is enunciated, up to the present, as science, is suspended on the idea of God. Science and religion go very well together. It's a Dieu-lire! But this does not presuppose any awakening. Luckily, there is a hole. Between the social delusion and the idea of God, there is no common measure. The subject takes himself to be God, but he is impotent to justify that a signifier can be produced, a signifier S index 1, and still more impotent to justify that this S_1, index 1, represents him for another signifier, and that it is through this that there pass all the effects of sense, which are right away blocked up, are in an impasse. There you are.

Man's trick, is to stuff all of that, as I told you, with poetry which is a sense effect, but also a hole-effect. It is only poetry, as I told you, which permits interpretation, and that is why I no longer manage, in my technique, to get it to hold up; I am not enough of a pouâte, I am not pouâteassez!

There you are. That is to introduce the following, in connection with which we pose questions. The definition of neurosis, we must all the same be sensible and notice that neurosis depends on social relations. We shake up the neurosis a little, and it is not at all sure that in that way we cure it. Obsessional neurosis for example, is the principle of conscience. And then there are also bizarre things. There is someone called Clérambault who noticed one day, -- God knows how he found that! – that there was somewhere mental automatism. There is nothing more natural than mental automatism. That there should be voices, - voices, where do they come from? They come necessarily from the subject himself – that there are voices which say: 'She is wiping her bottom', one is stupefied that this derision – since to all appearances there is derision –, does not happen more often. For my part, I saw, at my presentation of ill people, as they say, if in fact there are ill people, I saw a Japanese, a Japanese who had something which he himself called a thought-echo. What would a thought-echo be if Clérambault had not pinpointed it? He calls this a serpigineu (billhook-like?) process. It is not even sure that it is a serpigineux process there where it is judged to be the centre of language. I for my part, I said all the same that this Japanese who had a very lively taste for the metatongue, namely, that he took great enjoyment in having learned English, and then French afterwards. Is this not where the slippage was? He slipped into mental trauma from this fact that, in all these metatongues that he managed to handle rather easily, well then, he could not find himself in them. I for my part advised that he should be given some room and that one should not stop at the fact that Clérambault had invented, one fine day, a thing called mental automatism. Mental automatism is normal. If as it happens I do not have it, for my part, that is by chance. There are all the same, all the same somethings that can be called bad habits. If one starts saying things to oneself, as the aforesaid Japanese expressed himself textually, if one starts to say things to oneself, why would that not slide towards mental automatism because it is all the same quite certain that, according to what Edgar Morin says in a book which was recently published and in which he questioned himself about the nature of nature, it is quite clear that nature is not as natural as all that, it is even in this that there consists this rottenness which is what is generally called culture. Culture seethes, as I pointed out to you in passing. Yes.

The types modelled by social relations consist in word play. Aristotle imputes, we do not know why, being hysterical to the woman; it is a play on the word hysteron. I pointed out something to you about kinship. La parenté en question, is a book tackled by Needham, Rodney Needham who is not the good one. Why does everyone get engulfed in the most banal type of kinship? Why do people, who come to speak to us in psychoanalysis, talk to us only about that? Why would we not say that we are entirely akin to a pouâte for example, in the sense that I articulated just now, the pas pouâteassez? A *pouâate, one has just as much kinship with him, why does psychoanalysis orient, orient people who open themselves to it, orient people, in the name of what, towards their childhood memories? Why does it not orientate them towards a kinship with a pouâte, a pouâte among others, any one at all? Even a pouâte, is very commonly what is called a mental defective. It's hard to see why a pouâte would be an exception.

A new signifier, one that would have no kind of sense, that would perhaps be what would open us up to what, in my lumpish way, I call the Real. Why would one not attempt to formulate a signifier which would, contrary to the use that is habitually made of it, which would have an effect? Yes. It is certain that all this has an extreme character. If I am introduced to it by psychoanalysis, this is all the same not without an import (portée). Portée means sense, it has exactly no other incidence. Portée means sense and we always remain stuck to sense. Why is it that we have not yet forced things sufficiently, in order, in order to test what that would produce, to forge a signifier which would be other.

Good, I will stick with that for today.

If ever I summon you in connection with this signifier, you will see it advertised and this will all the same be a good sign, since I am only relatively mentally defective, I mean that I am like everyone else, since I am only relatively mentally defective, who knows, a little light may come to me.

Seminar I: Wednesday 15 November 1977

How kind of you to go out of your way like that for what I have to say to you! There you are, I entitled my seminar – can you hear? – I entitled my seminar this year: 'Time to conclude' (Le moment de conclure).

What I have to say to you, I am going to say it, is that psychoanalysis is to be taken seriously, even though it is not a science. It is even not a science in any way. Because the problem is, as someone called Karl Popper has superabundantly shown, is that it is not a science because it is irrefutable. It is a practice that will last as long as it will last, it is a practice of chit-chat (bavardage). There is no chit-chat without risk. Already the word chit-chat implies something. What it implies is sufficiently said by the word bavardage, which means that there are not only sentences, namely, what are called propositions which imply consequences, words also. Chit-chat puts speech at the level of dribbling (baver) or of spluttering, it reduces it to the sort of spattering that results from it. There you are.

This does not prevent analysis from having consequences: it says something. What is meant by 'saying' ('dire')? 'To say' has something to do with time. The absence of time – it is something people dream about – is what is called eternity and this dream consists in imagining that one wakes up. One spends one's time dreaming, one does not dream simply when one sleeps. The unconscious, is very precisely the hypothesis that one does not dream only when one is asleep. I would like to point out to you that what is called 'the reasonable' is a phantasy; it is quite manifest at the beginning of science. Euclidian geometry has all the characteristics of phantasy. A phantasy is not a dream, it is an aspiration.

The idea of the line, of the straight line for example is manifestly a phantasy; by luck, we have got out of it. I mean that topology has restored what we should call weaving (tissage). The idea of neighbourhood is simply the idea of consistency, if we only allow ourselves to give body to the word 'idea'. It is not easy. It was all the same Greek philosophers who tried to give body to the idea. An idea has a body: it is the word that represents it. And the word has a quite curious property, which is that it makes the thing (qu'il fait la chose). I would like to equivocate and to write that as: 'qu'il fêle achose' (that it splits the thing?), it is not a bad way of equivocating. Using writing to equivocate can be of use, because we need equivocation precisely for analysis. We need equivocation, it is the definition of analysis, because as the word implies, equivocation (l'équivoque) is immediately turning towards sex. Sex – I told you, is a saying: that is worth whatever it is worth – sex does not define a relationship. This is what I stated in formulating that there is no sexual relationship; that only means that, in man and no doubt because of the existence of the signifier, the set of what could be sexual relationship is a set – we have managed to cogitate that, we do not know very well moreover how it happened – is an empty set. So then this is something that allows a lot of things. This notion of empty set is what is appropriate for the sexual relationship. The psychoanalyst is a rhetor (rhêteur): to continue equivocating I would say that he 'rhetifies' (rhêtifie), which implies that he rectifies. The analyst is a rhetor, namely, that 'rectus', a Latin word, equivocates with 'rhêtification'. One tries to say the truth. One tries to say the truth, but that is not easy because there are great obstacles to saying the truth, even if only because one makes mistakes in the choice of words. The Truth has to do with the Real and the Real is doubled, as one might say, by the Symbolic. I happened to receive, from someone called Michel Coornaert – I received it through someone who wishes me well and to whom the Coornaert in question had sent it – I received from this Coornaert a yoke which is called Knots and links – it's in English – which means, because it is not altogether simple, that one must metalanguage, namely, translate, one never speaks of a tongue except in another tongue. If I said that there is no metalanguage, it was in order to say that language does not exist; there are only multiple supports of language that are called 'lalangue' and what is very necessary, is that analysis manages by a supposition, manages to undo by speech what has been made by speech. In the order of the dream that the field of using language gives itself, there is an misuse (bavure) which is that Freud calls what is at stake 'Wunsch'. As we know it is a German word, and the Wunsch in question has as property that we do not know whether it is a wish (souhait), which in any case is very vague, a wish addressed to whom? Once one wants to say it, one is forced to suppose that there is an interlocutor and, from then on, one is into magic. One is forced to know what one is demanding; but precisely what defines the demand is that one never demands except through what one desires – I mean that by passing through what one desires – and one does not know what one desires. That indeed is why I put the emphasis on the desire of the analyst. The subject supposed to know from which I supported, defined transference, supposed to know what? How to operate? But it would be altogether excessive to say that the analyst knows how to operate. What is required, is that he knows how to operate appropriately, namely, that he takes into account the import of words for his analyser, which incontestably he is unaware of.

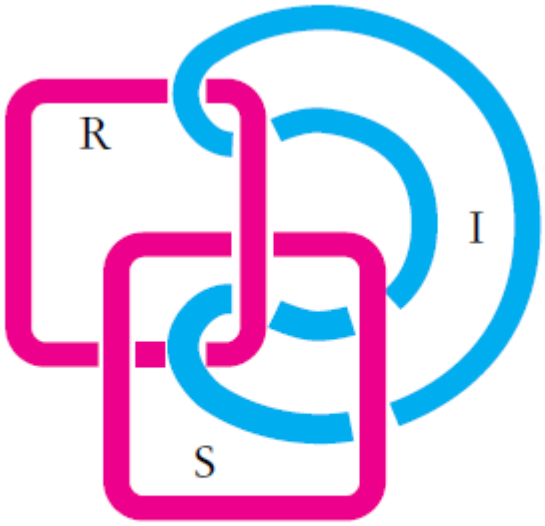

Fig. I-1

So that I must trace out for you what is involved in what I called, I put forward in the form of the Borromean knot. Someone who is none other – I have to name him – than J.B., Jean-Baptiste, Lefebvre-Pontalis granted an interview to Le Monde, he would have done better to refrain. He would have done better to refrain, because what he said is not worth much: from the fact that it appears, that my Borromean knot is supposed to be a way of strangling everyone, of suffocating people. Yeah!

Good, here all the same is what I can add to the dossier of this Borromean knot. It is quite obvious that, that is how it is drawn, I mean that one interrupts, because one projects things, one interrupts what is at stake, namely, a cord. A cord makes a knot, and I remember that there was a time when Soury made the reproach, to someone who is here present, made the reproach of having made this knot wrongly. I no longer know very well how he had effectively made it. But let us say that here, (I), we have indeed the right, since the Borromean knot has the property of not naming each of the circles in a way that would be univocal.

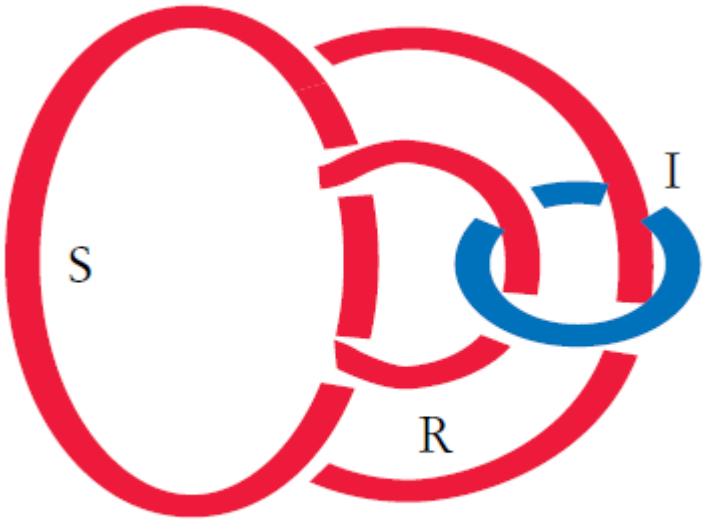

Fig. I-2

In the Borromean knot you have this, which means that you can designate each of these circles by whatever term you wish, I mean that it is not important whether this is called I.R.S. here, on condition of not misusing, I mean to put these 3 letters, you still have a Borromean knot.

Suppose that here we were to designate as distinct the R and the S, namely, the Real and the Symbolic, there remains the third which is the Imaginary. If we knot, as it is here represented [I-3], the Symbolic with the Real, which of course would be the ideal, namely, that since words make the thing, 'the Freudian Thing' ('la Chose Freudienne'), the Freudian 'Crachose', I mean that it is precisely with the inadequation of words to things that we have to deal: what I called 'the Freudian Thing', was that words mould themselves onto things: but it is a fact, the fact is that it does not happen (ne passe passe pas) there is neither splutter (crachat) nor crachose and that the adequation of the Symbolic only makes things phantastically.

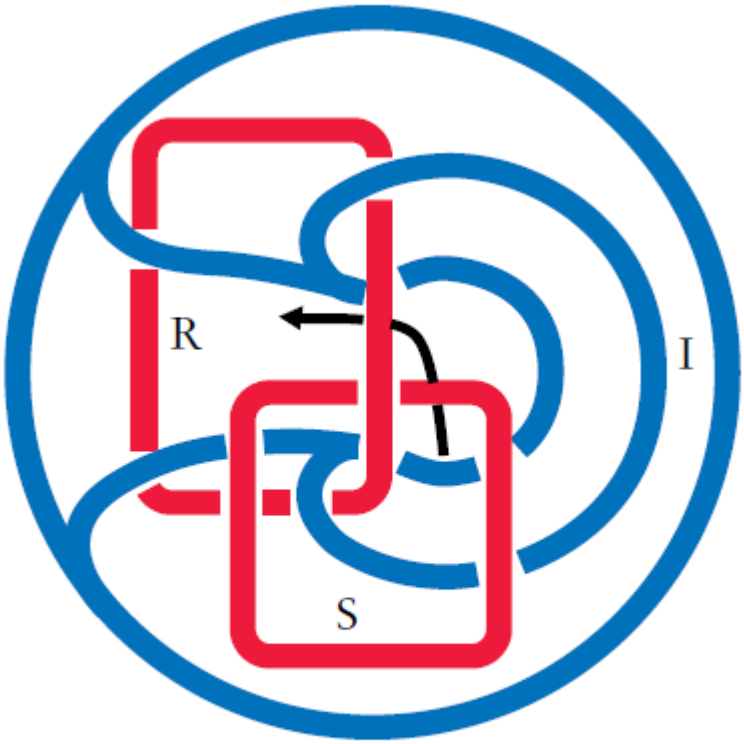

Fig. I-3

So that the bond, the ring which is supposed to be this Symbolic with respect to the Real or this Real with respect to the Symbolic do not hold up, I mean that it is quite simple to see that on condition of making the cord of the Imaginary more supple, what follows is very exactly that by which the Imaginary does not hold up – as you can see in a manifest way – does not hold up, since it is clear that here, passing under the Symbolic, this Imaginary comes here, and it comes here even though, even though it is under the Symbolic. I would ask you to note that here it is free, namely, that the Imaginary suggested by the Symbolic is freed.

This indeed is why the history of writing suggests that there is no sexual relationship. Analysis, on this occasion, consumes itself. I mean that, if we make an abstraction about analysis, we cancel it out. If we notice that we are only talking about alliances or of kinship, the idea comes to us to speak about something else and this is why indeed analysis, on occasion, may fail. But it is a fact that each particular person speaks of nothing but that.

Is neurosis natural? It is only natural inasmuch as in man there is a Symbolic; and the fact that there is a Symbolic implies that a new signifier emerges, a new signifier to which the Ego, namely, consciousness would identify itself; but what is proper to the signifier, which I called by the name of S_1, is that there is only one relationship that defines it, the relationship with S_2: S_1 S_2. It is inasmuch as the subject is divided between this S_1 and this S_2 that it is supported, so that one cannot say that it is a single one of the two signifiers that represents it.

Is neurosis natural? It would be a matter of defining the nature of nature. What can be said about the nature of nature? Nothing but the fact that there is something that we imagine can be accounted for by the organic, I mean by the fact that there are living beings; but that there are living beings, not alone is not self-evident, but it was necessary to speculate about a whole genesis, I mean that what are called genes undoubtedly mean something, but it is only a wish to say something. We have nowhere present this springing forth of a line of descendents, whether evolutionary, or even on occasion creationist – they are equally valid. The creationist speculation is no more valid than the evolutionary speculation, since in any case it is only a hypothesis.

Logic is only supported by very little. If we do not believe in what is in short a gratuitous way that words make things, logic has no raison d'être. What I called the rhetor that there is in analysis – what is at stake here is the analyst – the rhetor only operates by suggestion. He suggests, that is what is proper to the rhetor, he does not impose in any way something which would have consistency and that is even why I designated by ex what is supported, what is only supported by ex-sisting. How must the analyst operate to be a proper rhetor? Here indeed is where we reach an ambiguity. The unconscious, it is said, does not know contradiction, this indeed is why the analyst must operate with something which is not founded on contradiction. It is not said that what is at stake is either true or false. What constitutes the true and what constitutes the false, this is what is called the weight of the analyst and that is why I am saying that he is a rhetor.

The hypothesis that the unconscious is an extrapolation is not absurd and this indeed is why Freud had recourse to what is called the drive. The drive is something which is supported only by being named and by being named in a way that is as I might say farfetched (qui la tire ... par les cheveux) namely, which presupposes that every drive, in the name of something which is found to exist in the child, that every drive is sexual, but there is nothing to say that something deserves to be called drive with this inflection which reduces it to being sexual. What is important in the sexual, is the comic, it is that, when a man is woman, it is at that moment that he loves, namely, that he aspires to something which is his object. On the contrary, it is qua man that he desires, namely, that he is supported by something which is properly called a hard-on (bander).

Life is not tragic, it is comic and it is nevertheless rather curious that Freud should have found nothing better than to designate by the Oedipus complex, namely, by a tragedy, what is at stake in the affair. It is hard to see why Freud designated, when he could have taken a shorter path, designated by something other than by a comedy what he was dealing with, what he was dealing with in this relationship which links the Symbolic, the Imaginary and the Real. For the Imaginary to be exfoliated, it only has to be reduced to phantasy, the important thing is that science itself is only a phantasy and that the idea of an awakening is properly speaking unthinkable.

That's what I had to say to you today.

Seminar 2: Wednesday 13 December 1977

That is to indicate to you that it is a torus. That is why I wrote hole. In principle, it is a fourfold torus. It is a fourfold torus, such that anyone of the four may be reversed.

Here is the fourfold torus that is at stake [II-1].

It is Soury who noticed that by reversing any one of the four that one obtains what I am showing you, what I am showing you in the figure on the left [II-2].

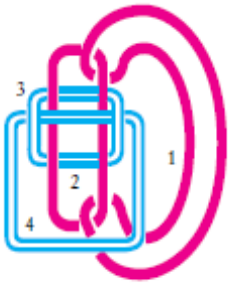

Fig. II-1

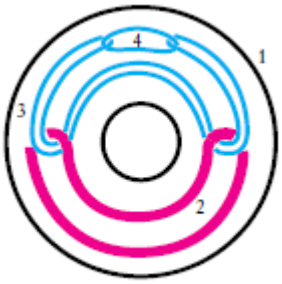

Fig. II-2

By reversing any one of the four, one obtains this figure which consists in a torus except for the fact that inside the torus, we only do what is presented there on the board, namely, rings of string, but each one, each one of what you see there, each one of these rings of string is itself a torus. And this ring of string reversed as torus gives the same result, the same result, namely, that inside the torus which envelopes everything, each of the rings of string which is nevertheless a torus, each of the rings of string, which I repeat is also a torus, each of these rings of string functions in the way that Soury has formulated in the form of this drawing. This implies an asymmetry, I mean that he has chosen a particular torus to make of it the torus such as I have drawn it: it is the torus that he has reversed – I would ask you to be careful – and, in this respect, he has given it a privilege over the other tori which only figure here as rings of string.

Nevertheless [II-1], it is quite obvious that the torus that he has chosen, the torus that he has chosen and which could be designated by 1,2,3,4, starting from the back towards what is in front.

This is the one which is in front (1).

This is the one which is most in front and this one which is a little more in front – that is why I give it no.3 – this one is completely in front.

Moreover, as you see, provided that you have a bit of imagination, as you see, there are four of them and it is by choosing one and reversing it that one obtains the figure that you see on the left [II-2] and this figure is equivalent for any one of the rings, I mean of the tori.

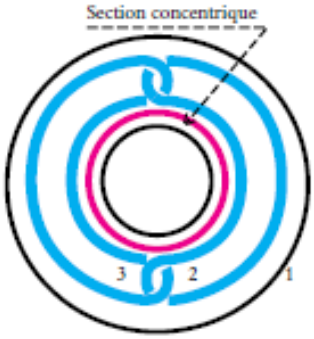

Fig. II-3

Nevertheless I pose the objection to Soury something which is not any less true, which is that by reversing any one whatsoever of what is called the Borromean knot, one obtains the following figure, [II-3]. The 2 and 3 being unimportant, it is by reversing what I designated here as 1, namely, 1 of the elements of the Borromean knot, and you know how it is drawn [II-4].

Fig. II-4

In the figure on the left, this one [II-2], it is quite clear that the rings of string which are inside, inside the torus, and which in a way equivalent to what I said just now can be depicted as tori, each one of these reversed tori envelopes the two other tori, just as what is designated in 1 [II-3] here is a torus which has the property of enveloping the two others, on condition that it is reversed. Therefore what is in the figure on the right [II-4} becomes what is in the figure on the left [II-3], on condition that each of these tori is reversed.

It is obvious that the two figures on the left [II-2 and [II-3] are more complex than the two figures on the right [II-1] and [II-4]. Besides, what makes the third figure appear is the following: that once reversed, the torus that I designated by 1 on the figure, by going from left to right on the third figure...

Left	Right
II-2	II-1
II-3	II-4
	II-5

Something comes to me, comes to my mind in connection with these tori: suppose that what I called 'privileging a torus' happens at the level of torus 2 for example, can you imagine what torus 2 becomes by privileging it as compared to torus 3, namely, by reversing it inside, inside of the torus that I designated by the name of 1, namely, by privileging the 2 with respect to torus 3?

In one case, the reversal will change nothing to the relationship of torus 2 with respect to torus 3. In the other, it will amount to a rupture of the Borromean knot. This comes from the fact that the Borromean knot behaves differently according as the rupture happens in a different way on the reversed torus. I am going to indicate on the left hand figure [II.3] something which is obvious:
Concentric section 1
Perpendicular section 2
The fact is that by sectioning (2) the reversed torus in the way that I have just done, the Borromean knot is undone. On the contrary by sectioning in this other way (1) which is, I suppose, evident to all of you as being equivalent to what I am drawing here [II-5], that it is equivalent, the Borromean knot is not dissolved, while in the present case the cut (2) that I have just made dissolves the Borromean knot. Therefore the privilege that is at stake is not something univocal.

The reversal of any one at all of what ends up at the first figure, the reversal does not give the same result according as the cut is presented on the torus in such a way that it is, as I might say, concentric to the hole or according to whether it is perpendicular to the hole.

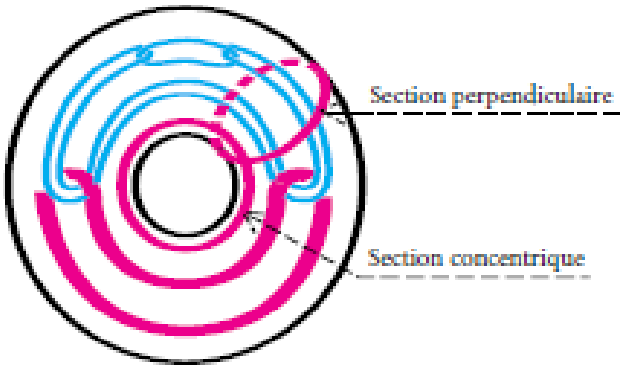

Fig. II-5

It is quite clear – this can be seen on the second figure [II-3] – it is quite clear that it is the same thing, I mean that by breaking according a tracing out which is this one (concentric), the threefold Borromean knot is dissolved; for it is quite clear that even in the state of torus, the two figures that you see there dissolve, I mean are separated if the reversed torus, cut in the sense that I have called longitudinal (2), while I can call the other sense transversal (1). The transversal does not free the threefold torus but on the other hand the longitudinal frees it. There is therefore the same choice to be made on the reversed torus, the same choice to the made according to the case that one wants or does not want to dissolve the Borromean knot.

The figure on the right [II-5], the one that materialises the way in which the surrounding torus must be cut in order – I think that you see this to free the three, the three that remain – it is quite clear that, by drawing things like that, you see that what I designate on occasion as (2), that this is freed from (3) and that secondarily the (3) is freed from the (4), [II-1 and II-2].

I propose the following, the following which is initiated by the fact that in the way of dividing up the figuration of (4), Soury had a preference, I mean that he prefers to mark that the (4) is to be drawn like that.

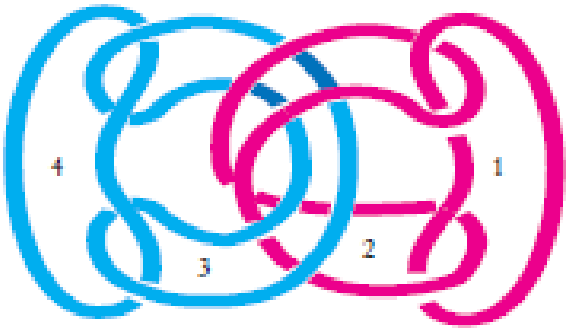

Fig. II-6

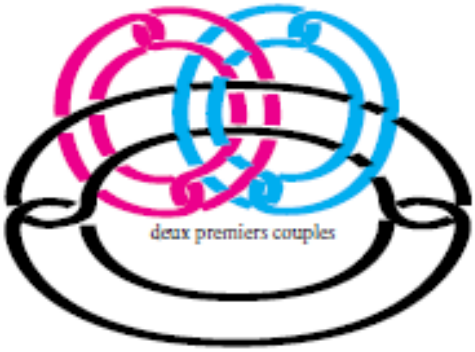
This is equally a Borromean knot but I suggest that there is a six-fold Borromean knot, six-fold which is not the same as the Borromean knot which, as I might say, would follow in single file, it is a more complex Borromean knot and I am showing you the way in which it is organised, namely, that, as compared to the 2 that I drew first, these two are equivalent to what happens from the fact that one is on the other; and in this case, the Borromean knot must be inscribed by being over this one which is above and under this one which is below. This is what you see here: it is under the one that is below and over the one that is above.

Fig. II-7



It is not easy to draw. Here is the one that is below... You have in connection with these two couples, of these 2 couples which are depicted here, you have only to notice that this one is above, the third couple therefore comes above and underneath the one that is below.

I pose the question: does reversing one of those which are here, give the same result as what I called the single file figure, namely, thus, the one which is presented thus 1,2,3,4,5,6, all ending in the ring here, would reversing the 6 fabricated in this way give the same result as the reversal of any one at all of these three sixes. We already have an indication of response: which is that the result will be different.

Fig. II-8

It will different because the fact of reversing any one at all of these six that I call single file will give something analogous to what is depicted here [II-2]. On the contrary, the way in which the figure [[II-7] is reversed will give something different.

I apologise for having directly implicated Soury. He is certainly very valuable for having introduced what I am stating today. The distinction between what I called the longitudinal cut and the transversal cut is essential. I think I have given you a sufficient indication of this by this cut here. The way in which the cut is made is quite decisive. What happens by the reversal of one of the six, as I designated it here, this is what is important to know and it is by putting it in your hands that I desire to have the final word on it.

There you are, I will stay with that for today.

Seminar 3: Wednesday 20 December 1977

I am working in the impossible to say.

To say (dire) is something different than to speak (parler). The analyser speaks. He produces poetry. He produces poetry when he manages to do so – it is not frequent – but it is art (il est art). I cut because I do not want to say 'it is late' ('il est tard').

The analyst, for his part, slices (tranche). What he says is a cut, namely,, has some of the characteristics of writing, except for the fact that in his case he equivocates in the orthography. He writes differently so that thanks to the orthography, to a different way of writing, he makes ring out something other than what is said, than what is said with the intention of saying, namely,, consciously, inasmuch as consciousness goes very far.

That is why I say that, there is neither in what the analyser says, nor in what the analyst says, anything other than writing. This consciousness does not go very far, one does not know what one is saying when one speaks. This indeed is why the analyser says more than he means to say and the analyst slices by reading what is involved in what he means to say, if in fact the analyst knows what he himself wants. There is a lot of play (jeu), in the sense of freedom, in all of that. There is play in the sense that the word ordinarily has.

All of that does not say to me how I slipped into the Borromean knot to find myself, on occasion, with a lump in my throat because of it. It must be said that the Borromean knot is that which, in thought, constitutes matter.

Matter is what one breaks, there also in the sense that this word ordinarily has. What one breaks (casse), is what holds together and is supple, on some occasions, like what is called a knot.

How did I slip from the Borromean knot to imagining it composed of tori and, from there, to the thought of reversing each one of these tori? This is what led me to things that constitute metaphor, natural metaphor, namely,, that that it is close to linguistics, insofar as there is one. But metaphor has to be thought of metaphorically.

The stuff of metaphor is that which in thought constitutes matter or, as Descartes says 'extension', in other words body.

The gap is filled here as it has always been. The body represented here is a phantasy of the body. The phantasy of the body is the extension imagined by Descartes. There is a distance between extension, Descartes' extension, and the phantasy. Here there intervenes the analyst who colours the phantasy of sexuality.

There is no sexual relationship, certainly, except between phantasies and the phantasy is to be noted with the accent that I gave it when I remarked that geometry, 'l'âge et haut-maître hie' [a play on la géométrie], that geometry is woven by phantasies and in the same way the whole of science.

I read recently a yoke called – it's in four volumes – The world of mathematics. As you see it's in English. There is not the slightest world of mathematics. It is enough to hang together the articles in question. That is not enough to make what is called a world, I mean a world that holds up. The mystery of this world remains absolutely intact.

And at the same time what is meant by knowledge? Knowledge is what guides us. It is what means that people were able to translate the knowledge in question by the word 'instinct', of which what I articulate as l'appensée [thought] forms part, and that I write like that, because it constitutes an equivocation with appui [support].

When I said like that, the other day, that science is nothing other than a phantasy, than a phantastical kernel, I follow (je suis), certainly, but in the sense of 'to follow' (suivre) and, contrary to what someone in an article hoped, I think that I will be 'followed' onto this terrain. It seems obvious to me.

Science is something futile which has no weight in anyone's life, even though it has effects: television for example, but its effects depend on nothing but phantasy, which, I will write like that, who hycroit [believes in it].

Science is linked to what is especially called the' death-drive'. It is a fact that life continues thanks to the fact of reproduction linked to phantasy. There you are

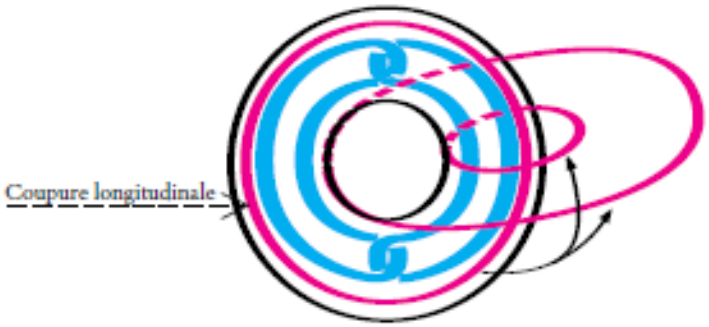

Fig. III-1

The other day I made you a torus while pointing out to you that it is a Borromean knot, namely,, that there are here three elements: the reversed torus and then the two rings of string that you see there, which are also tori; and I pointed out to you, that if one cuts this torus, that if one cuts it like that, namely,, as I expressed myself, longitudinally with respect to the torus, it is not surprising that one obtains the cutting effect which is that of the Borromean knot; it is the contrary that would be surprising.

It is the same thing as to cut ... here I am completing it since I left this Borromean knot unfinished ... it is the same thing to cut it like that: except for the fact that in this case the cut is - contrary to that one - perpendicular to what is called the hole.

Fig. III-2

But it is quite clear that if things are completed, namely, that this holds together, namely, that something happens here like a junction the circular cut leaves the Borromean knot intact and it is indeed the same cut which is rediscovered there, the same cut as results from what I called the longitudinal cut.

The cut is nothing other than what eliminates the Borromean knot entirely. It is by this very fact something that is repairable provided one sees that the torus that is involved is stuck together again if one deals with it properly in a reversed way.

Namely, that what is seen ... provided one cuts perpendicular to the hole ... what is seen is that the torus at the very moment preserves the Borromean knot.

It is enough for the cut to have some of the characteristics of the cut that I have called perpendicular to the hole in order for it to preserve the knot.

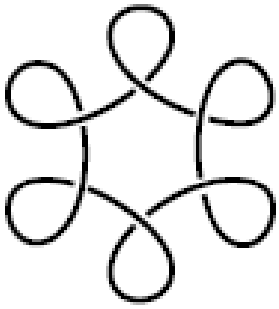

Fig. III-3

Suppose that the longitudinal cut that we have made here shares in the characteristics of the longitudinal cut. Namely, that something is established of this nature here. In other words that it turns around the torus. I mean the cut.

Here is what we obtain: the reversal of the torus wards off the effects of its cut.

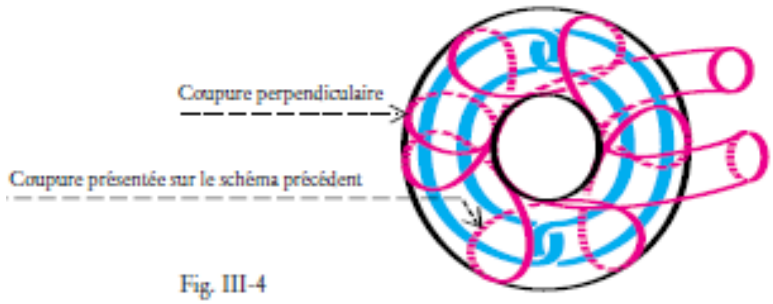

Fig. III-4

The phantasy of the cut is enough to preserve the Borromean knot. For there to be a phantasy there must be a torus.

The identification of the phantasy to the torus is what justifies, as I might say, my imagining of the reversal of the torus.

So that here I am going to draw what is involved in what I called earlier a ‘six-fold torus'.

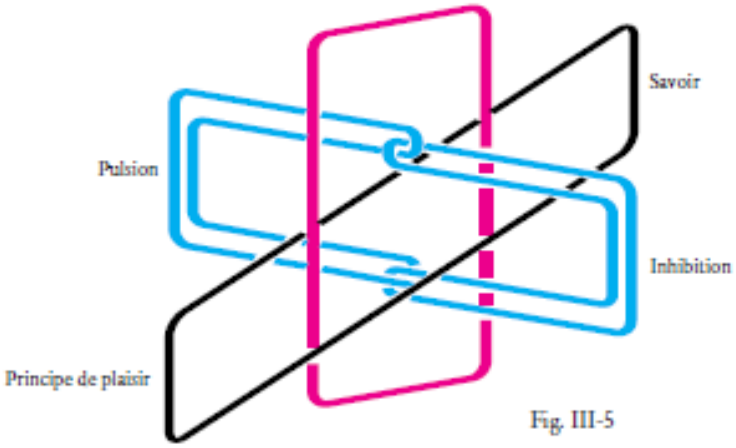

Fig. III-5

And imagine what can be deduced from the depiction I have just made. There is a couple: drive – inhibition.

Let us take for example this one, drive – inhibition.

In the same way for the others let us call the following couple: pleasure principle – unconscious.

We can sufficiently see from this fact that the unconscious is this knowledge which guides us and that I earlier called pleasure principle.

The interesting thing to notice is that the third, I mean that which, because of this is organised in this way – I beg your pardon these knots are always difficult to make – here you have a better way, one that I had to correct there, of representing what I called pleasure principle – unconscious, drive – inhibition, and it is here that the third is presented as the coupling of the Real and phantasy.

This puts a stress on the fact that there is no reality. Reality is constituted only by phantasy, and phantasy is moreover what gives material for poetry.

This means that our whole development of science is something which, we do not know along what path, which emerges, irrupts due to what is called the sexual relationship.

Why is there something that functions as science? It is poetry. The apperception of this world of mathematics convinced me of this. There is something that manages to get through by what is reduced in the human species to the sexual relationship. What is reduced to the sexual relationship in the human species is something that makes it very difficult for us to grasp what is involved for animals. Do animals know how to count? We don't have any proof of it, I mean tangible proofs.

As regards to what is involved in science, everything starts from numeration.

In any case what is involved in this practice is moreover poetry. I am speaking of the practice that is called analysis. Why did someone called Freud succeed in his poetry, I mean, in establishing a psychoanalytic art? This is what remains altogether doubtful.

Why do we remember certain men who have succeeded? It does not mean that what they have succeeded in doing is valid.

What I am doing here as was remarked by someone of common sense, Althusser, is philosophy. But philosophy is the only thing we know how to do.

My Borromean knots, are also philosophy. They are philosophy that I handled as best I could by following the current, as I might say, the current of what results from Freud's philosophy. The fact of having stated the word unconscious is nothing more than poetry with which one makes history. But history - as I sometimes say - history is hysteria.

Freud, if he sensed clearly what is involved in the hysteric, if he fabulated around the hysteric, this is obviously only a fact of history.

Marx also was a poet, a poet who has the advantage in having succeeded in making a political movement. Moreover if he qualified his materialism as historical, it was certainly not unintentionally. Historical materialism is what is incarnated in history. Everything that I have just stated concerning the stuff which constitutes thought is nothing other than to say things exactly in the same way.

What one could say about Freud, is that he situated things in such a way that it was successful. But it is not sure. What is at stake is a composition, the composition such that I was led to render all of that coherent, to give the note of a certain relationship between the drive and inhibition, and then the pleasure principle and knowledge – unconscious knowledge, of course.

Pay careful attention that it is here, and that here is the third element, I mean that this is where phantasy is and where there is found what I designated as the Real.

I really did not find anything better than this way of imaging metaphorically what is involved in Freud's doctrine.

What seems to me to be materially unwarranted, is to have imputed so much material to sex. I know well that there are hormones, that hormones form part of science; but it is quite clear that this is the densest point and that here there is no transparency.

Good, I will stop there.

Seminar 4: Wednesday 10 January 1978

I was a little jaded because Saturday and Sunday there was a congress of my School. Since people preferred that, anyway Simatos preferred that there should only be members of this School, we went a bit far and I only got back with difficulty.

Someone – someone who was speaking to me - was expecting from it, given that the subject was nothing other than what I call the Passe, someone was expecting from it some light about the end of analysis.

One can define the end of analysis. The end of analysis is when one has gone round in circles twice, namely, rediscovered that of which one is prisoner. Rebeginning twice the turning round in circles, it is not certain that it is necessary. It is enough for one to see what one is captive of.

And the unconscious, it that: it is the face of the Real – perhaps you have an idea, after having heard me numerous times, perhaps you have an idea of what I call the Real – it is the face of the Real of that in which one is entangled.

There is someone called Soury who is kind enough to pay attention to what I stated about the rings of string and he questioned me, he questioned me about what that means, what was meant by the fact that I was able to write like that the rings of string.

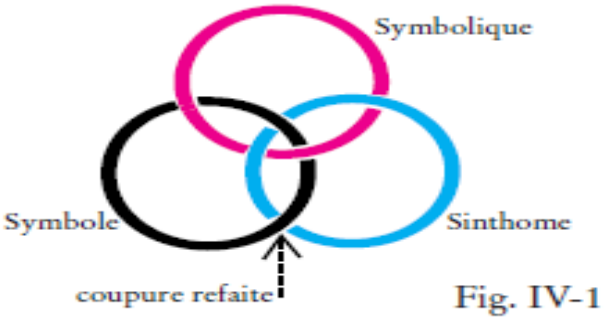

Fig. IV-1

For this is how he writes them.

Analysis does not consist in being freed from one's sinthomes, since that is how I write symptom. Analysis consists in knowing why one is entangled by them.

This happens because there is the Symbolic.

The Symbolic is language; one learns to speak and that leaves traces. That leaves traces which are nothing other than the symptom and analysis consists – there is all the same progress in analysis – analysis consists in realising why one has these symptoms, so that analysis is linked to knowledge.

It is very suspect. It is very suspect and it lends itself to every kind of suggestion. That's the word that must be avoided

That's what the unconscious is, the fact that one has learned to speak and by that very fact one has allowed all kinds of things be suggested to one by language.

What I am trying to do is to elucidate something about what analysis really is. About what analysis truly is, one cannot know unless you ask me for an analysis. That is how I conceive of analysis.

This indeed is why I traced out once and for all these rings of string that, of course, I ceaselessly make mistakes in their depiction.

I mean that here (IV-1), I had to make a cut here and that this cut, I had nevertheless prepared, it nevertheless remains that I have to remake it.

Counting is difficult and I am going to tell you why: the fact is that it is impossible to count without two kinds of figures. Everything starts from zero. Everything starts from zero and everyone knows that zero is altogether capital.

Two lines of numbers

The result, is that here it is (O) is 1. This is how this begins at 11, how the 1 here (*), and the 1 there (O) are distinguished. And of course, it is not the same type of figures which function to mark here the 1 which permits 16.

Mathematics makes reference to the written, to the written as such; and mathematical thought is the fact that one can represent for oneself a writing.

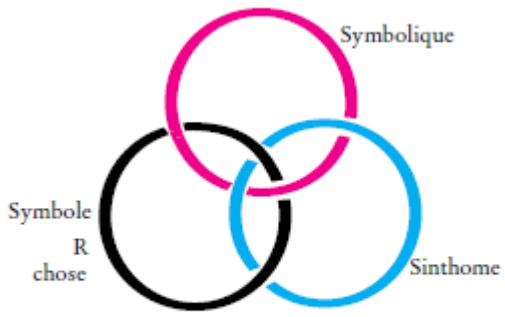

Fig. IV-2

What is the link, if not the locus, of the representation of writing? We have the suggestion that the Real does not cease to be written. It is indeed by writing that forcing is produced. The Real is all the same written; for, it must be said, how would the Real appear if it were not written?

That indeed is how the Real is there. It is there through my way of writing.

Writing is an artifice. Therefore writing only appearsby an artifice, an artifice linked to the fact that there is speech and even saying. And saying concerns what is called the truth. This indeed is why I say that one cannot say the truth.

In this business of the passe¸I am lead, since, as they say, it is I who produced the passé, produced it in my School in the spirit of knowing what might well arise in what is called the mind (l'esprit) of an analysand to be constituted, I mean receive people who come to him to ask for an analysis.

That might perhaps be done in writing, I suggested it to someone who moreover was in complete agreement. To proceed by way of writing has a chance of getting a little bit closer to the Real than what is currently done, since I tried to suggest to my School that the passeurs could be named by a few people.

The trouble is that these writings will not be read. Why so? Because people have read too much about writing. So what chance is there that they would be read. They lie there on paper; but paper is also toilet paper.

The Chinese realised that there was toilet paper, the paper with which you wipe your bottom. It is impossible therefore to know who reads. There is surely writing in the unconscious, if only because the dream, the principle of the unconscious – that's what Freud said – the lapses and even the witticism are defined by the readable. One has a dream, one does not know why, and then subsequently it is read; the same with a slip, and everything that Freud says about the witticism is quite notorious as being linked to this economy which is writing, economy as compared to speech. The readable - that is what knowledge consists of. And in short, it is limited. What I say about the transference is that I timidly advanced it as being the subject – a subject always supposed, there is not subject, of course, there is only the supposed – the supposed-to-know. What could that mean? The supposed-to-know-how-to-read-otherwise (autrement). The otherwise in question, is indeed what I write, for my part also in the following way: S(Ø). Otherwise, what does that mean? Here it is a matter of the O, namely, the big Other. Does otherwise mean: otherwise than this spluttering called psychology? No, otherwise designates a lack. It is a matter of lacking differently (autrement). Differently on this particular occasion, does that mean, differently to anyone else? It is indeed in this way that Freud's speculations are truly problematic. To trace the paths, leave the traces of what one formulates, this is what teaching is, and teaching is also nothing other than going around in circles. It has been stated, like that, we do not know why, there was someone called Cantor who constructed set theory. He distinguished two types of set: the set which is innumerable and – he points out – within writing, namely, that it is within writing that he makes the series of whole numbers, for example, equivalent to the series of even numbers. A set is only numerable starting from the moment when it is demonstrated that it is bi-univocal. But precisely in analysis, it is equivocation that dominates. I mean that it is from the moment that there is a confusion between this Real that we are indeed led to call 'thing', there is an equivocation between this Real and language, since language, of course, is imperfect – this indeed is what is demonstrated about everything which is said to be most certain – language is imperfect. There is someone called Paul Henri who published that in Klincksieck. He calls that, language, 'a bad tool'. One could not say it better. Language is a bad tool and this indeed is why we have no idea of the Real. It is on this that I would like to conclude.

The unconscious, is what I have said, that does not prevent us counting, counting in two ways which are only for their part ways of writing. What is most real, is writing and writing is confused.

There you are, I will stay with that for today, since, as you see, I have reason to be tired.

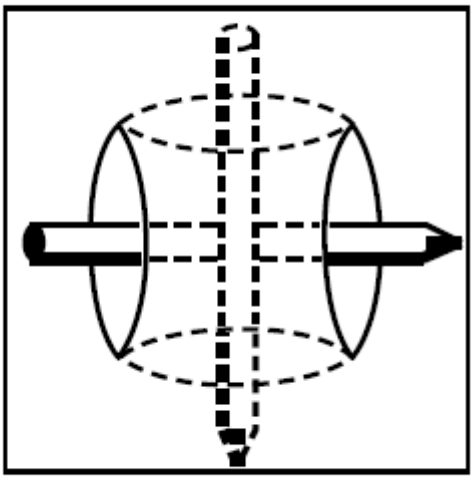
Seminar 5: Wednesday 17 January 1978

There is nothing more asymmetrical than a torus. That leaps to the eyes.

I have just seen Soury – where is he? – I have just seen Soury and I shared this idea with him. He right away illustrated to me what was at stake by marking for me, through a little construction of his own, the cogency of what I cannot say: I was stating. Because in truth...

There you are. So then I am going to show you this. I am going to have it passed around. It is a construction that Soury was good enough to make for me. You are going to see that here there is a passage, that there is, in what is constructed there, a double thickness and that, to mark the whole of the paper, here there is a double thickness, but here there is only one, I mean: at this level here which is continued into the whole of the sheet. Therefore behind what here constitutes a double thickness, there is only a third. There you are. I am going to pass around this piece of paper.

Fig. V-1



There is a passage at the back. We introduce a pencil which goes underneath the pencil introduced in the front. [See the details of this diagram at the end of the session]

I recommend you to take advantage of the double thickness so that you can see that it is a torus. In other words that this, (V-1), is constructed more or less like that, (V-2), namely, that one passes a finger through this, but that here is what one can call the outside of the torus which continues with the rest of the outside - I am giving it to you - this is what I call asymmetry. There you are.

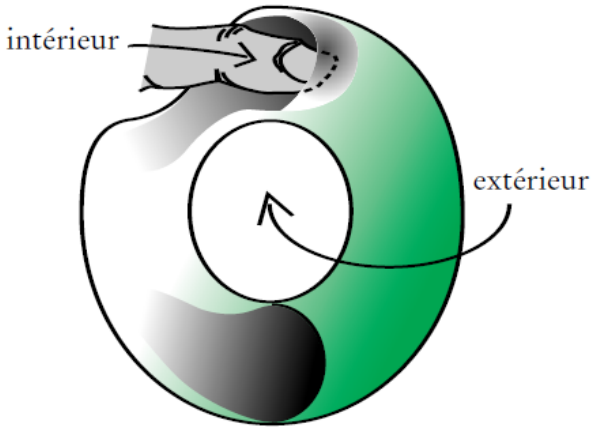


Fig. V-2

This is also what I call 'what makes a hole', for a torus makes a hole.

I succeeded – not right away, after a certain number of approximations – I succeeded in giving you the idea of the hole. A torus is considered, quite rightly, to be holed. There is more than one hole in what is called man; he is even a veritable sieve. Where do I enter?

This question mark has its response for every 'tétrume un' [perhaps a pun on être humain, human being]. I do not see why I would not write it like that on this particular occasion. This question mark, as I have just said has its response for every tétrume u'. I would write that: l'amort [death\love] what is bizarre in the – because why not also write like that: les trumains [a play on trumeau: a dodderer]; there, I am putting them in the plural – what is bizarre in les trumains, why not write it like that also, since moreover using this orthography in French is justified by the fact that les, the sign of the plural, is well worthy of being substituted for being which, as they say, is only a copula, namely, is not worth much. Is not worth much by the usage that one amphest amphigourique! Yeah!

What is curious, is that man is very keen on being mortal. He hoards death! While all living beings are destined to die, he only wants it to be so for him. Hence the activity deployed around burials. There were even people formerly who took care to perpetuate what I write as laïque hors la vie. They took care to perpetuate that by making mummies of them. It must be said that les néz-y-après (the later-born?)) afterwards put a proper order on it. Mummies were seriously shaken. I got the information from my daughter, - because, in my French-Greek dictionary, there were no mummies – I got the information from my daughter who was good enough to go out of her way, to wear herself out to find a French-Greek dictionary. I was informed by my daughter and I learned that this mummy, is called like this in Greek: to skeleton soma, the skeleton body. Mummies are precisely designed to preserve the appearance of the body to teretichomenon soma. This is also what she brought me. I mean that the to teretichomenon soma means 'to prevent rotting'. No doubt the Egyptians liked fresh fish and it is obvious that before carrying out a mummification on the dead person – this at least is the remark that was made to me on this occasion – mummies are not especially attractive. Hence the lack of ceremony with which people manipulated all these eminently breakable mummies. This is what those born afterwards devoted themselves to.

That is called in Quetchua, namely, around Cuzco – Cuzco is written like: CUZCO – sometimes people speak Quetchua there. People speak Quetchua there thanks to the fact that the Spaniards, since everyone speaks Spanish, the Spanish are careful to preserve this tongue. Those that I am calling the les néz-y-après, are called in Quetchua, 'those who are formed in the belly of the mother', and that is written, since there is a Quetchua writing. This is called: Runayay. This is what I learned with, good God what I would call a velar which teaches me to produce Quetchua, namely, to act as if it were my natural tongue, to give birth to it. It should be said that this velar had the opportunity to explain to me that in Quetchua this is produced by the palate. There is a ferocious amount of aspiration in it.

A frightful person by the name of Freud knocked into shape some stammerings that he qualified as analysis, we don't know why, to state the only truth that counts: there is no sexual relationship among human beings (les trumains). It is I who concluded that, after had an experience of analysis, I succeeded in formulating that. I succeeded in formulating that, not without difficulty, and this is what led me to notice that I had to make some Borromean knots.

Suppose that we follow the rule, namely, that, as I say, above the one which is above and below the one which is below.

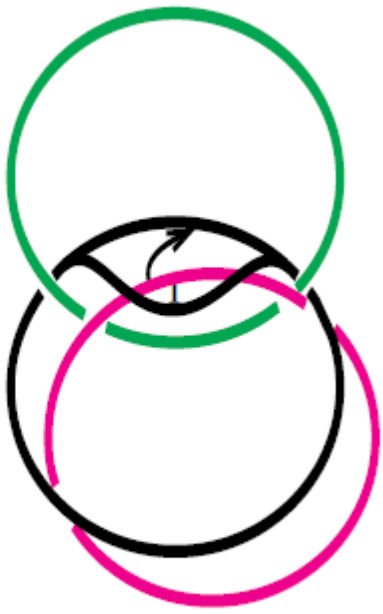

Fig. V-3

Well then, it is manifest that as you see it does not work. Namely, that it is enough for you to lift that (1) [V-3] to notice that there is a one above, one in the middle and one below and that as a consequence the three are freed from one another. This indeed is why this must be asymmetrical. It must be like this to reproduce the way in which I drew it the first time; here it must be below, here above, here below and here above [V-4].

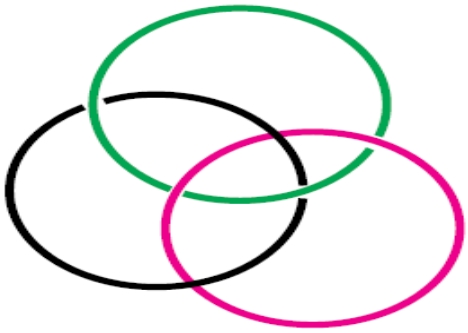

Fig. V-4

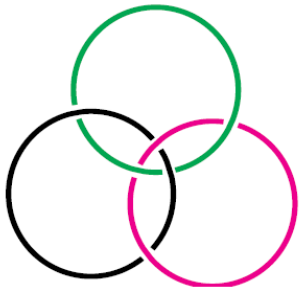
It is thanks to this that there is a Borromean knot. In other words, it must alternate [V-5]. It can just as well alternate in the opposite direction [V-6], in which there consists very precisely the asymmetry.

Fig. V-5



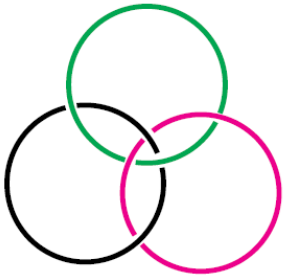


Fig. V-6

I tried to see what was involved in the fact that...it is just as well not to make the black line cross the red line more than twice. One could moreover make them cross one another more than twice. One could make them cross four times, that would change nothing in the veritable nature of the Borromean knot.

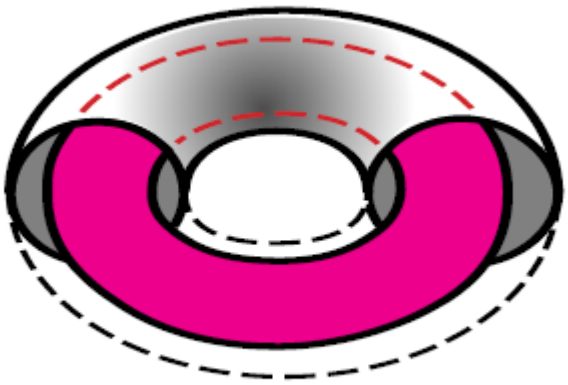

Fig. V-7

There is a sequence to all of that. Soury, who is responsible for some of it, has developed some considerations about the torus. A torus is something like that. Suppose that we make a torus be held inside another one [V-7]. That's where the business of inside and outside begin. Because let us turn over the one which is inside in that way. I mean: let us not only turn over this one, but at the same time let us turn over that one [V-8 & 9]. There results something which is going to make what was first of all inside come to the outside and, since the torus in question has a hole, what is outside of it is going to remain outside of it and is going to end up with this form that I called the rod-like shape, where the other torus is going to come inside.

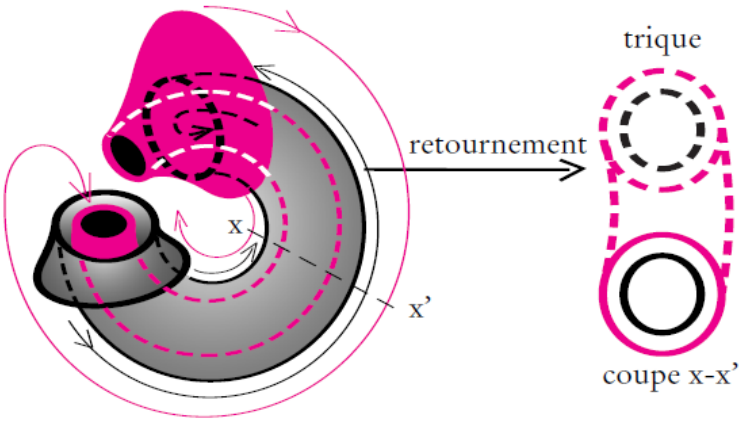

Fig. V-8

Fig. V-9

How should we consider these things? It is very difficult to speak here about inside when there is a hole inside a torus. It is completely different to what is involved in the sphere.

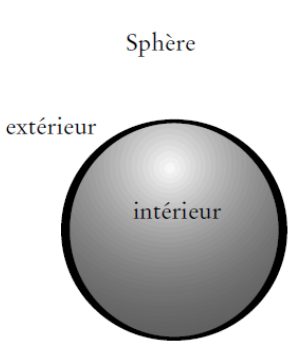

Fig. V-10

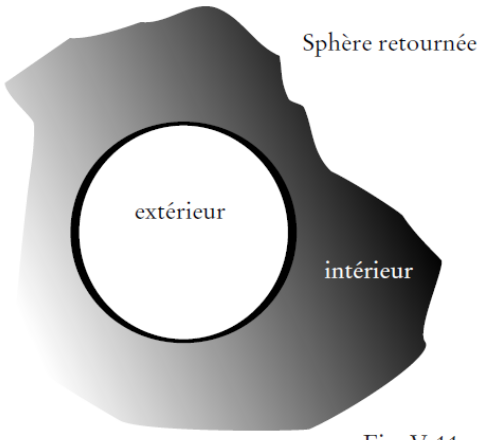

Fig. V-11

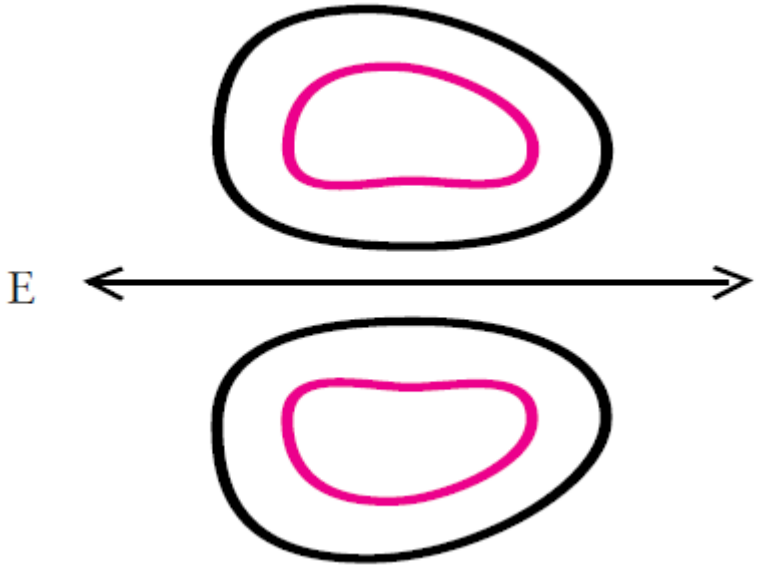
A sphere, if you will allow me to draw it now, is something like that. The sphere also can be turned over. One can define the surface as aiming at the inside. There will be another surface which aims at the outside. If we turn it over, the inside will be outside, by definition, the sphere. The outside will be inside; but in the case of the torus, because of the existence of the hole [V-12], of the inside hole, we will have what is called a great disturbance. The hole on the inside, is what is going to disturb everything that is involved in the torus, namely, that there will be in this rod, there will be a necessity that what is inside becomes what? Precisely the hole. And we will have an equivocation concerning this hole which from then on becomes an outside.

Fig V-12



In this rod there will be a necessity that what is inside becomes the hole.

The fact that the living being is defined almost like a rod, namely, that it has a mouth, indeed an anus, and also something which furnishes the inside of his body, is something which has consequences that are not unimportant. It seems to me that this is not unrelated to the existence of the zero and the one. That the zero is essentially this hole, is something that is worth exploring.

I would really like here if Soury took the floor. I mean by that, if he were willing to speak about the one and the zero it would be very agreeable to me. That has the closest relationship with what we are articulating concerning the body. The zero is a hole and perhaps he could tell us more about it, I am speaking about the zero and of the one as consistency.

Are you coming? I am going to give you that. Off we go. In this rod there is a necessity that what is inside becomes the hole.

Soury: There you are. On the zero and the one of arithmetic, there is something which is analogous to the zero and to the one of arithmetic in the chains. Therefore, what makes the zero and the one exist, are preoccupations about systematisation.

In the case of numbers, good, it is operations on numbers that make the zero and the one hold up. For example, with respect to the operation of summation, with respect to addition, the operation of summation, the zero appears as a neutral element – these are terms which are in place – the zero appears as a neutral element and the one appears as a generating element, namely, that by summation, one can obtain all the numbers starting from the one, one cannot obtain any number starting from zero. Therefore what locates the zero and the one, is the role that they play with respect to addition.

Good then, in the chains, there are things analogous to that. But then it is indeed a matter of a systematic point of view about the chains, anyway a point of view on all the chains, all the Borromean chains; and the chains as forming a system.

X: What does systematising mean? [Laughter]

Soury: Good already I do not believe in the possibility of presenting these things, namely, that these things depend on writing and I think it's scarcely possible to talk about these sorts of things. So then the possibility of answering..., in short, for those things, I do not think that speech can take these sorts of things in charge. Anyway systematisation depends on ways of writing (écritures) and precisely speech cannot practically take charge of anything that is systematic. Anyway what would be systematic and what would not be, I don't know, but it is rather what ways of writing can carry and speech, is not the same thing. And any speech which wants to give an account of writing appears to me to be acrobatic, risky.

So then systematisation, what is typical of systematisation, is the number: it is numbers and arithmetic. Namely, numbers, all we know are operations on numbers, namely, that we only know systems of numbers, we do not know numbers, we only know the system of numbers. Good, there is a bit of systematisation in the chains, anyway there is something in the chains which behaves like summation, like addition. It is a certain operation of interlacing, which means that one chain and one chain gives another chain, just as one and one number gives another number. Anyway, I will not try to define this operation of enlacing I am not going to try to present it, to introduce it.

But then with respect to this operation of enlacing, the Borromean chain, the threefold chain appears as the generating case, the exemplary case, the case which engenders all the rest, namely, that the exemplarity of the threefold chain can be demonstrated. Relying on an article by Milnor which is called Links groups in English, the exemplarity of the Borromean chain can be demonstrated, namely, that any Borromean chain can be obtained starting from the threefold chain. In particular the chains of any number of elements whatsoever can be obtained starting from the threefold chain. Anyway, what ensures that the threefold chain is something which engenders everything. It is something which is generative and which is comparable to the one of arithmetic. In the same sense that the one is generative in the numbers system, the threefold Borromean chain is generative. All the Borromean chains can be obtained starting from the threefold chain by certain operations. Therefore the threefold chain plays the same role as the one.

So then there is something which plays the same role as the zero, it is the twofold chain which is a degenerated case, anyway which is a degenerated case of the Borromean chain. So then I'm going to draw the twofold chain. I am going to draw it because it has been less often drawn than the twofold chain.

Twofold chain, the chain of two interlaced circles: Fig V-13
The chain two interlaced tori: Fig V-14

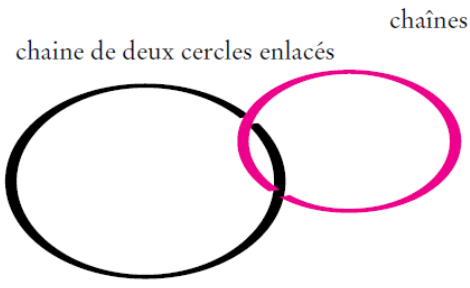

Fig. V-13

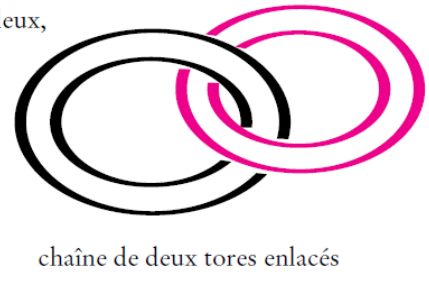

Fig V-14

This is a plane presentation of the twofold chain. It is two circles caught up in one another, you can do it with your fingers.

The twofold chain is a degenerate case. In the preoccupations of systematisation, degenerate cases take on an importance. They are quite analogous to the zero. The zero is a degenerate number, but it is from the moment on that there are preoccupations of systematisation on numbers that the zero takes on its importance, namely, that...anyway that does not allow us to respond to this business of systematisation, it is only a criterion, anyway quite simply a sign of what is systematic or non-systematic. It is according to whether the degenerate cases are excluded or not excluded. So then I could respond that systematisation is when one includes degenerate cases and non-systematisations when one excludes degenerate cases.

Anyway the zero is a degenerate case which takes on importance. While for the chains, the operations of interlacing on the chains or the operation of interlacing on Borromean chains, what plays the role of zero, is the twofold chain, namely, the twofold chain does not generate anything, it only generates itself; the twofold chain function like a zero, namely, zero + zero = zero; interlacing the twofold chain with itself still gives a twofold chain. From the point of view of interlacing, the fourfold chain is obtained starting from two threefold chains, namely, 3 and 3 make 4. The fourfold chain is obtained by interlacing of two threefold chains. Anyway it's analogous to arithmetic; but by locating oneself with respect to the number of circles, that gives 3 and 3 make 4, like that, that could be described as 2 and 2 make 2. Anyway the fact that 2 is neutral, is a degenerate neutral – the terms which exist on this subject, namely, generative element, neutral element anyway terms in mathematical culture.

The one is a generative element, the zero is a neutral element. I reinforce these terms a little by saying, instead of saying generative and neutral, exemplary and degenerate, namely, that the one would be an exemplary number and the zero a degenerative number. The threefold chain is the exemplary Borromean chain and the twofold chain the degenerate Borromean chain.

One can see degenerate in different ways. It is also that, the fact that this chain is degenerate one can see in different ways; in different ways, it is too much. I have several reasons for qualifying the twofold chain as degenerate and several reasons is too much. One reason, is that the neutral element for interlacing, is that interlaced with itself, it only gives itself. It does not generate anything other than itself; it is degenerate in the sense in the sense that to be a neutral element with respect to the operation of interlacing. That's one meaning. A second meaning of being degenerate, is when the Borromean property degenerates to two; the Borromean property, the fact that each element is indispensible, that, when one removes an element, the others no longer hold together, that one element makes all the others hold together; each one is indispensible, they all hold together, but not without each one. The Borromean property, means something starting from 3, but with 2 everything is Borromean. At 2 everything is Borromean because holding together, anyway holding together in 2's, anyway 'each one is indispensible' at 2 is automatically realised, while starting from 3, the 'each one is indispensible' is not automatically realised, namely, that it is a property which can be either true or false, it is yes or no: yes or no the chain is Borromean. In 2's, all the chains are Borromean, therefore the Borromean property degenerates in 2's. So then a third reason why this chain is degenerate, is that in this chain a circle is the reversal of another circle. Another way of saying it is that these two circles have the same neighbourhood, anyway this is the business of surface. The fact is, that if these two circles are replaced by their two neighbourhood surfaces, it is the same surface, these two circles are only the redoubling of one another, but it is a pure redoubling, it is a pure complementing, but that can be seen on the surfaces. That can be seen on the surface chains, and not on the circular chains. That can be seen on the surface chains which are associated with this chain of circles, namely, if this chain of two circles [V-15] corresponds to a chain of two tori, this chain of two tori corresponds to the redoubling of the torus.

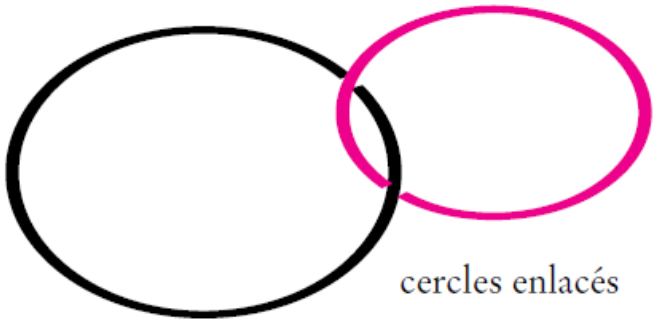

Fig. V-15

Now that is not obvious; it is not obvious that two interlaced tori is the same thing as two tori which are the redoubling of one another just as the tyre and the tube. The tyre and the tube, is the redoubling of one torus into two tori, two tori which are only two versions of the same torus it is a redoubled torus. That two tori being the redoubling of the torus, is the same thing as two interlaced tori is not obvious. It is the reversal which will say that and the reversal in not obvious. Which means that the two circles [V-15], is the same thing as these two interlaced tori [V-16]; these two interlaced tori is the same thing as a redoubled torus [V-17] and that, that is a reason for saying that it is a degenerate chain.

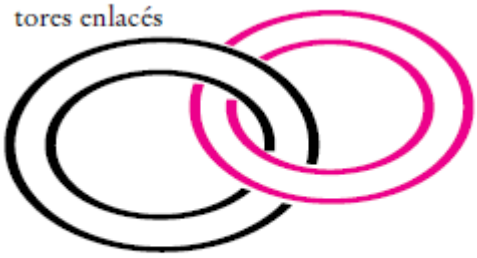

Fig. V-16

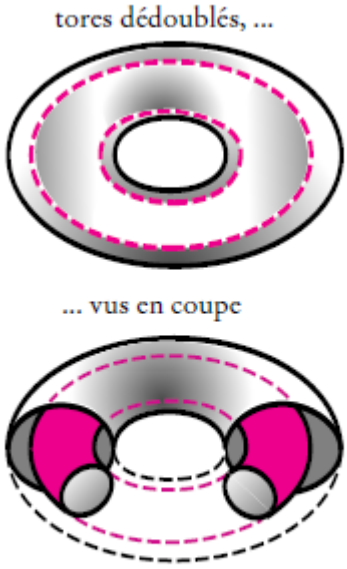

Fig. V-17

A degenerate chain because that only means, these two, the two of these two circles, is not the division of space in two halves. There you are, that is a criterion for saying that a chain is degenerate: it is that the elements of the chain only represent one division of space. These two circles here are valid for the division of space into two halves. It is in this sense that it is degenerate: it is that these two here, are only two halves of space. So then why two circles which only represent two halves of space, why is this degenerate? Well then because in the general case of chains, the several circles of chains only represent a division of space in several parts, but it happens that here these two circles only represent a division, a partition, a separation of space into two parts.

Lacan: I would like all the same to intervene to point out to you that if you reverse this circle there for example, the right-hand circle [V-15], you free at the same time the left hand circle. I mean that what you get, is what I call the rod [V-18], namely, that this rod is free from...and it is all the same very different from the torus inside the torus.

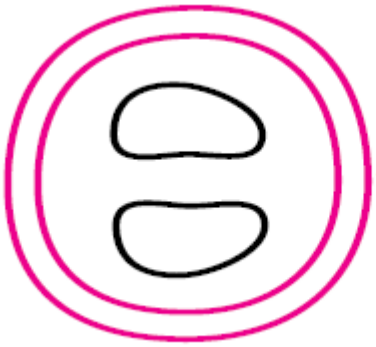

Fig. V-18

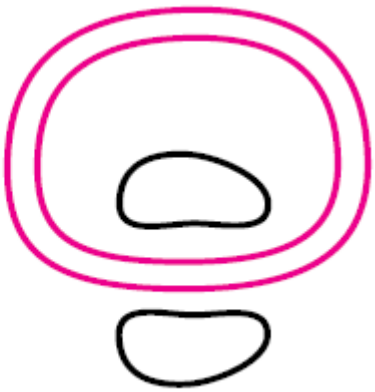
Soury: It is different, but it is...Look that one, in order to disimplicate one from the other of these two tori, this can only be done by a cut; it is not simply by reversal; by reversal one cannot one cannot disimplicate the two tori, which will be seen for example, if one makes the reversal with a little hole, anyway by holing. If one makes the reversal of a torus by holing, one cannot, one cannot disimplicate the two tori, they can't be disimplicated, unchained, unlaced. It is only when one makes a cut; but to make a cut is to do far more than a reversal. To make the cut, is to do more than holing, and holing is doing much more than reversal. Namely, that to make a cut is to do much more than a reversal. One can make a reversal by cut, but what is done by cutting is not representative of what is done by reversal. And that, would be precisely, it would be exactly an example of it: the fact is that by a cut one can disimplicate one can unchain the inside and the outside while by reversal, it is not a question of disimplicating the complementarity of the inside and of the outside. The fact is that what is done by a cut is much more than what is done by reversal, even though the cut may appear to be as a way to carry out the reversal. In that the cut, is more than holing and the holing is more than reversal. The reversal can be carried out by holing; the holing, no, I hesitate to say that holing could be done by a cut all the same. But in the cut there is a holing there is a holing implicit in the cut.

Lacan: In other words what you obtain by holing is in effect like that [V-19].

Soury: Yes, yes.

Fig. V-19



Lacan: There is something which is all the same not mastered concerning that which...it is all the same a result different to that [V-17]!.

Soury: No! No! It's the same thing.

Lacan: It is precisely on this 'it's the same thing' that I would like to obtain a response from you. This 'it's the same thing'...when we reverse the two tori [V-17], we obtain the following [V-20]. It is all the same something completely different to that [V-19] which is much more like this [V-16]. There is something there which does not appear to me to be mastered, because this [V-17] is exactly the same as that [V-7].

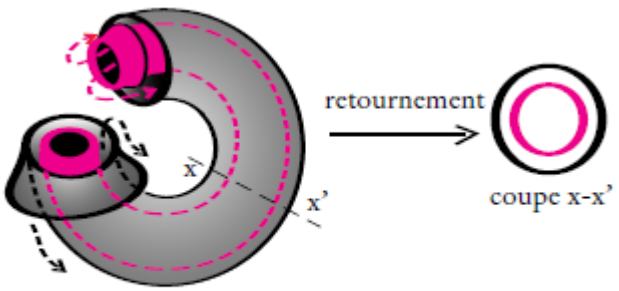


Fig. V-20

Soury: Good! So then we have two interlaced tori [V-19]. Here [V-20] it is two interlocking tori. That is two interlaced tori [V-14]. That [V-18] is two tori freed from one another, independent. So then what is the same thing, is that: two tori, two interlaced tori. And that is two interlaced tori.

Lacan: These [V-19] are not interlaced: one is inside the other.

Soury: Ah good! Good, I thought that it was that. Ah good! It is a matter of two tori, of the black and the red. While there, it is a matter of two interlocked tori, a black and a red interlocked here, here of two interlocked tori [V-20] and here of two interlaced tori [V-14].

Lacan: This is what is not mastered in the categories, in the categories of interlacing and of interlocking. I will try to find the solution which is properly speaking like interlacing. Interlacing is different ... (the end is inaudible).

Schema proposed by Pierre Soury

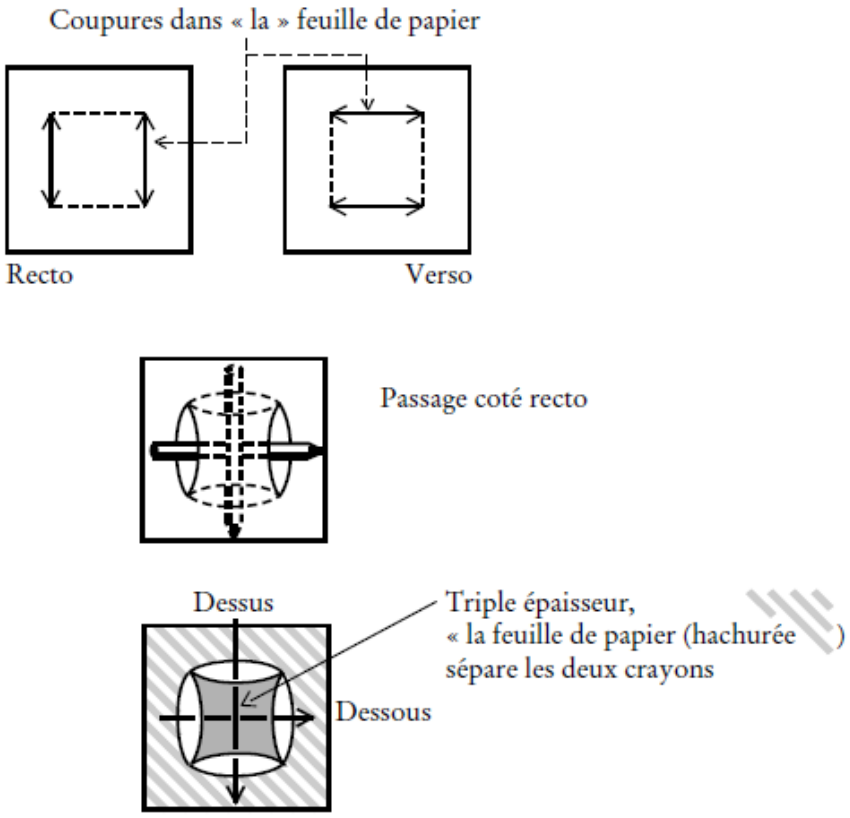

Figure V-1a, détail de la figure V-1, page 39.

Seminar 6: Wednesday 14 February 1978

I'm a little bit bothered because as it happens I do not have the intention of sparing you today.

There you are. There is something that I asked myself and that I made an effort to resolve. It is something which consists in the following: let us suppose something which is presented as follows, in other words which involves a double loop.

Fig. VI-1

Fig. VI-2

We are capable with this, namely, with this start to make a threefold Borromean knot. You can clearly see that here the two circles that are found to be something like that – they are circles seen in perspective – the two circles are knotted.

This is an idea that came to me; I wasn't sure that this would constitute a Borromean knot. But anyway I wagered and it proved to be right. Here you have to put in a bit of goodwill. Here is how this is pinned down. I put this to the test with Soury whom I am meeting for the moment. I am meeting him because he tells me sensible things on the subject of Borromean knot. Nevertheless I cannot say that he does not worry me. I mean that for this Borromean knot, he wanted at all costs to make a fourfold one. There was already a two, why make a four? This all the more so because the two does not hold up, while the four it appears will not hold up any the more, namely, that it would certainly become unknotted unless by making it circular. I already spoke to you about this circular Borromean chain. It presupposes something which, as they say, joins the beginning, at the start, and this something which can only be the ring which ends it at the same time as it inaugurates it [VI-3].

Fig. VI-3

Fig. VI-4

Fig. VI-5

This Borromean knot, the one that is outlined as I have just said [VI-2] is not circular. More exactly it is only circular when it is threefold. When it is threefold on condition of making go underneath the lower one, above the upper one, we obtain a typical Borromean knot namely, this one here [VI-4]. This one [VI-1] and that one VI-6]. They are completed like that [VI-6].

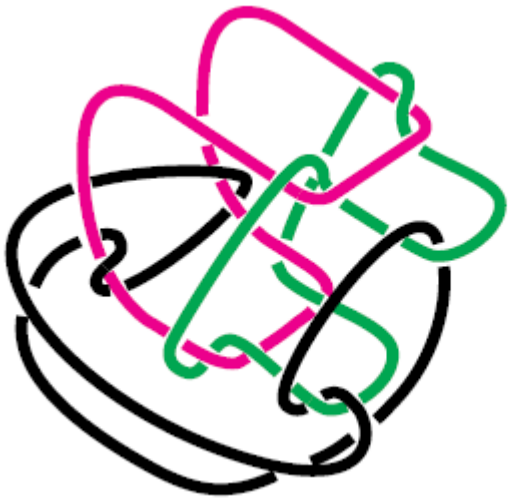

Fig. VI-6

It is quite clear that we still have not got used to this Borromean knot. Why the devil did I introduce it? I introduced it because it seemed to me that it had something to do with the clinic. I mean that the trio of Imaginary, Symbolic and Real seem to me to have a sense. In fact what is certain is something which is pinned down like this, namely, which is the third. Well then, that is knotted. This is not obvious on the figure which is there [VI-6]; but if one puts the thing that I added in black, put in front, I mean here, one would see that these two blacks can be identified. I am going to try to show it to you with the help of a supplementary drawing. It is really very complicated.

It is more or less that. It is more or less that on condition of completing it as follows. It is obvious that I am extremely awkward in these drawings [Laughter]. There is another way of doing it which is the one that I owe to Soury and which presents itself more or less like this. The way of doing it is the following [VI-7], which is completed in the following drawing [VI-8] which is obviously not very clear.

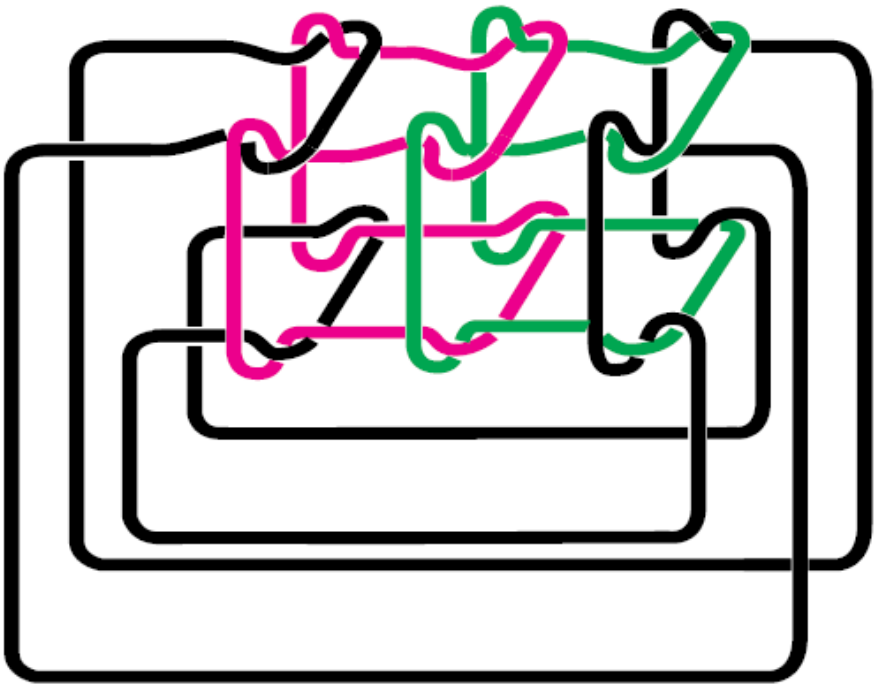

Fig. VI-7

You should realise that it is conceivable to put the third drawing here, I mean the black drawing. Perhaps, what incontestably is unknotted as it is presented here [VI-5], perhaps you will manage to reconstitute the following which is knotted. I mean that here there is a threefold Borromean knot which is constituted by putting end to end, I mean by the fact that it is closed. That it is closed exactly like what I wrongly showed you here, it is closed as in the case of a simple Borromean knot. There you are.

I apologise for not having better prepared this class. I will try the next time to distribute to you some drawings that are a little clearer.

There you are, I am leaving you with that for today.

Fig VI-8 [Presented on the board by Lacan with Fig VI-7]

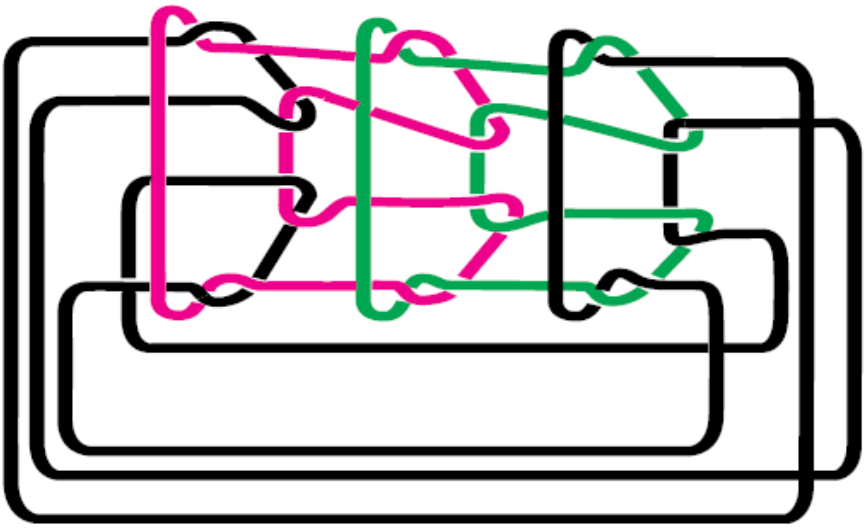

Fig. VI-8 (présentée au tableau, avec la figure VI-7, par Lacan)

Seminar 7: Wednesday 21 February 1978

There is someone called Montcenis, this at least is what I believe I read in the text that he sent me. He's not here? It's you? I thank you very much for having received this text which proves at the very least that there are people who were able to find their bearings, find their bearings in an appropriate way in the rings of string the last time [VI-7].

I repeat that what is at stake is something like this:

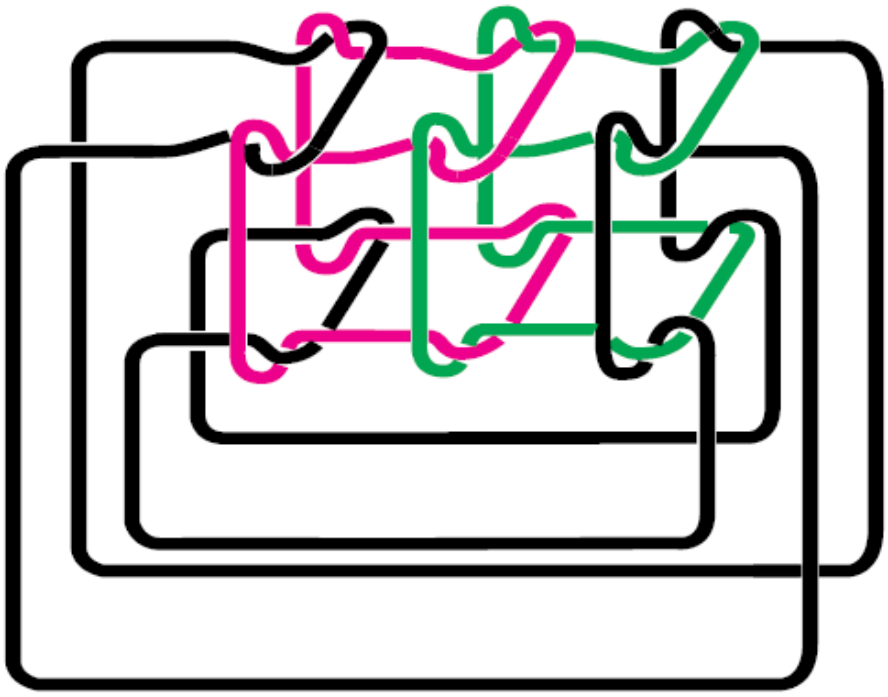

Fig. VII-1 [= Fig. VI-7]

Thanks to Soury, here present, I was able to obtain the transformation of this triple thing that I tried to reproduce there, this thing with three elements, thanks to Soury therefore, by a progressive transformation we have, we have something which has the same three elements. And if you consider what is on top, you can note – what is found at the top of the sheet that I only distributed to you so that you could reproduce it – what is found on top on condition of putting it, of considering it, what is found on top, you can see that this reproduces, reproduces the figure which is present here. It is simply sufficient for you to see that this passes under the three elements that compose the figure. And that this, from the moment that what you see on the right passes under what I called the three elements, this allows to descend what is involved in the black element and that one obtains this figure. What I am now asking Soury, is how the figure at the bottom can be fiddled with in order that it may re-produce, that it may r-produce the figure on top. He tried to depict for me what is at stake, namely, to fold back what is depicted at the bottom under the form of what comes in front and which could therefore be folded according to a movement which could displace forward what seems to be free. I do not see that he has convinced me on this point. I believe that very exactly these two objects are different.

N. Sels: It's the same. It is turned over like a pancake.

Lacan: I cannot see that it is turned over like a pancake. I don't think that's the case. That which is – it has been communicated to me that the figure on top is the image of what one sees in a mirror placed behind the figure at the bottom. It is very precisely this question of the mirror which differentiates the two figures, for a figure placed in a mirror is inverted. And this indeed is why I object to Soury that it is what he calls or what he defines as couple. A figure placed in a mirror is not identical to the figure, to the original figure [VII-2].

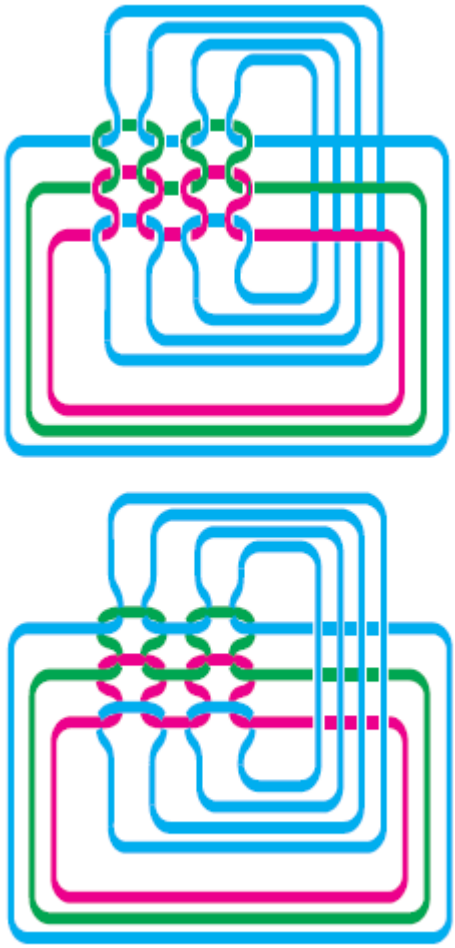

Fig. VII-2

Can Soury intervene here?

Soury: Yes. So then in this there are a lot of inversions, there are different sorts of inversions, there is the 'mirror-image' inversion, there is the inversion of 'reversing the paper as if it were something in wicker-work', there is the inversion 'exchanging the above and below', there is the inversion by which 'the front stitches become the stitches at the back' since it is a kind of stitching, there is the inversion according to which they are ranked – in this there are lines of rows and lines of stitches – wee have to know if the lines of rows pass under or over the lines of stitching, namely, that in the drawing on top the lines of stitches go underneath the lines of rows and, in the bottom drawing it is the contrary. So there is not just one inversion there is a whole quantity of them. So then there is a difficulty in this, which is that there is not just one inversion, there are multiple inversions. Good.

Lacan: And how many of these multiple inversions are there?

Soury: They have a tendency to proliferate (Laughter). So then here there is a principal inversion which is an object inversion; the principal inversion which means that there are two objects, they are the two toric stitchings.

Lacan: The two?

Soury: The two toric knittings. There are two toric knittings, they are two different chains. This is the principle inversion because they are two objects.

Good, there are inversions, another inversion is the inversion of plane and purl stitches, namely, the two faces of a jersey fabric. The two faces of a regular knitting – the regular knitting is the jersey knitting that has two faces – that is a very important inversion in the chain. Namely, that in it it is a question of a toric knitting, namely, a torus dressed in knitting, dressed in a regular knitting, in a jersey knitting and one of the faces of the torus is in plane stitches and the other face of the torus is in purl stitches. That's a second inversion.

In this there are still more inversions which are the inversions of the torus, namely, that one can change meridian and longitude or exchange inside and outside. I have already got to four inversions. There's the inversion of the reversal of the torus. That gives five inversions.

Now, on the plane presentation which is there, the principle inversion, is the inversion, it is not...anyway there is rather an apparent inversion: it is the inversion of above-below, namely, that these two drawings are deduced from one another by changing all the above-belows. I don't know how many inversions I have got to.

In this plane presentation, I would like to see there two inversions, namely, that there is the inversion of the knitting, namely, that in the central part of the plane stitches there come purl stitches; on this plane presentation, it is an inversion and another inversion, is that it is this business that the stitches go beneath or above the lines of rows. So then there are several inversions which are combined, already when there is simply one inversion, of the left-right type, one has every reason to take the left for the right and reciprocally.

Already simply a couple, a binary, an inversion, one is very likely to make mistakes, to choose one if one wants to choose the other. When there are several inversions, this is what I call binaries and liaisons of binaries. Finally in short where have I got to? To assure oneself, to have certainty about these things, in my opinion, it is not enough to succeed in imagining a distortion in space, because by imagining a distortion in space one remains too dependent on these inversions of couples and inversions of binaries. That appears to me to be necessary with respect to the proliferation of binaries, the couples of inversions, to make an exhaustive checklist. So then the defect of this sheet, from this point of view, is that it is not an exhaustive checklist, namely, that in order to make an exhaustive checklist which would correspond to this sheet here, four figures would be necessary, namely, that there should be four possible combinations, on the one hand plane stitch, purl stitch and on the other hand to know whether these lines of stitches and of rows pass beneath or above one another. Four drawings would be necessary to have something exhaustive, namely, that, I repeat, with respect to these inversions, one cannot avoid getting lost; there is a need for something exhaustive. Therefore we need a second sheet which means that there would be four drawings. There would be four plane presentations and on these four plane presentations, that would set things up properly to discuss: Are these four presentations the presentation of how many objects?' For it is found that these four presentations are the presentation of two objects, namely, that there are changes of presentation which do not change the object. Now it happens that on this sheet there are two presentations of the same object. So then...

Lacan: It is, it seems to me, clear that if one divides this sheet what one sees on the bottom figure is exactly what is reproduced in a mirror by what is depicted on the image on top.

N. Sels: No, no.

Lacan: What?

N. Sels: If it was in a mirror, what is on the left in one would be on the right in the other. It is the bottom.

Lacan: There are two different objects, because one is the mirror-image of the other. What you hold, is that what happens, since there are four inversions according to what you're saying, is that this would be four inversions and there would be two objects, two distinct objects in these four inversions. Here I only see one inversion, I agree with the person who communicated with me, the two schema represent the same object. If we concretise it by three concrete strings, the schema on top is the schema on the bottom always as seen in a mirror put behind and vice versa. The object considered has only these two schemas and in terms of this the scheme, the relationship of these two schemas is that of a mirror-image. Therefore it does not coincide. A mirror-image does not coincide with the original object, with the first figure. There are not two inversions, there is only one of them. There is only one but it introduces an essential difference namely, that the figure in the mirror is not identical to what is seen in the original figure. There is only a single inversion.

There you are! I am going to dismiss you now, because I believe, in material that is not especially difficult, that I have told you what is involved in these two images once inverted and which are only inverted once.

There you are, I am going to stay with that for today.

Seminar 8: Wednesday 14 March 1978

Someone put forward, in my regard, the imputation that I made my listeners do research or, or more exactly, that I managed to do so.

On this particular occasion it was Francois Wahl. This indeed is what I should manage to do. I stated formerly that 'I do not seek, I find', these were my words borrowed from someone who had in his own way a certain notoriety, namely, the painter Picasso.

Currently I do not find, I search. I search, and some people even want to accompany me in this research. In other words, I emptied, as one might say, these rings of string with which I formerly made Borromean chains. I transformed these Borromean chains not into tori, but into toric fabrics. In other words, it is tori that now carry my rings of string. It is not convenient because the torus, is a surface and there are two ways of treating a surface. A surface has features and these features which are bound to be on one of the faces of the surfaces, in other words one of the faces of the surface, these features, are actually what incarnate, support my rings of string, my rings of string which are always Borromean.

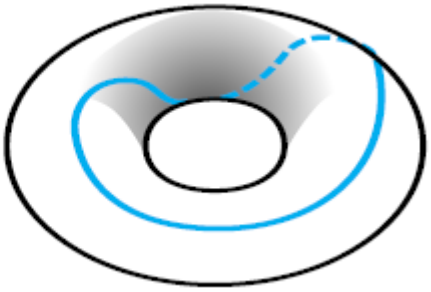

Fig. VIII-1

In fact the torus is at the centre of these features, it is fabricated more or less like that [VIII-1] and the features are on the surface. This implies that the torus itself is not Borromean.

That is the picture by Soury (see diagram VII-d atthe end of the session]. In it he distinguishes two elements, namely, the fact that a torus can be reversed, can be reversed in two ways. Either the torus is holed, holed from the outside. In that case as can be seen here, it is typical of being reversed, namely, that to draw things like that, it is reversed upside-down (à l'envers) and that the results are what one goes into, namely, what I would call the core (l'âme) of the torus becomes the axis. Namely, that the result of this reversal is something which is presented like this in cross section [VIII-3]. Namely, that the core of the torus becomes its axis. In other words, this is closed here and what is involved in the torus becomes the axis, namely, that the core is formed from the redeployment of the hole.

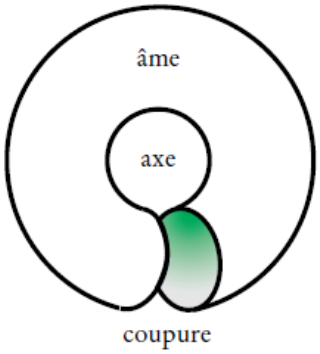

Fig. VIII-2

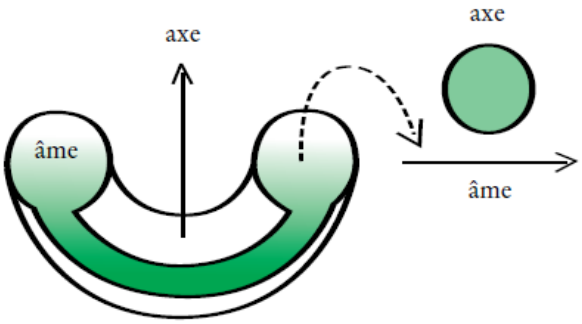

Fig. VIII-3

On the contrary, the reversal by cutting which has also the effect of transforming the torus by allowing – here is the cut – on allowing it to be reversed like this, also substitutes the core and the axis. Here the torus having what is called its core and here, because of the cut, what was first of all the core of the torus – here is the cut [VIII-2] – becoming its axis [VIII-3].

It seems to me, as far as I'm concerned, that the two cases are homogenous. Nevertheless the fact that Soury distinguishes this reversal by cutting from the reversal by hole impresses me. Namely, that I have great confidence in Soury.

(Note: The text up between the two '{' seems to be out of place)

{The two trefoils. There are knots. They are exchanged by two automorphisms. The plane presentations are exchanged by four automorphisms.

The two interlacings. These are orientated chains. They are exchanged by four automorphisms. The regular plane presentations are exchanged by eight automorphisms.

The two Borromean chains of two coloured straight lines and an orientated circle.

They are chains of two coloured straight lines by a and b and an orientated circle. They are exchanged by eight automorphisms. The plane presentations are exchanged by 16 automorphisms.

The two Borromean chains of three coloured orientated circles. They are chains of three circles coloured by a and b and c and orientated. They are exchanged by 96 automorphisms. The regular plane presentations are exchanged by 48 of automorphisms.

In other words what is called here crossroads of the strips – one says a crossroad of strips – is referred to a holed torus. Here also the reversal in question is a toric reversal, namely, half a hole.}

I am now going to let Soury take the floor and allow him to defend his position.

Naturally, there is something which impresses me, which is that the torus, if it is drawn like that [VIII-4],in perspective, the torus has the property of admitting the type of cut which is very exactly the following. If, starting from this cut, one reverses the torus, namely, that one makes the cut go behind the torus, the axis remains the axis and the core remains the core. There is a reversal of the torus, but without modifying what is found distributively the axis and the core – this is the axis. Is this sufficient to allow that the reversal by cutting works differently on the torus? It is indeed about this that I am posing the question. And on that I will give the floor to Soury who is willing, in my confusion, to take up the baton about what is at stake. Take your place here.

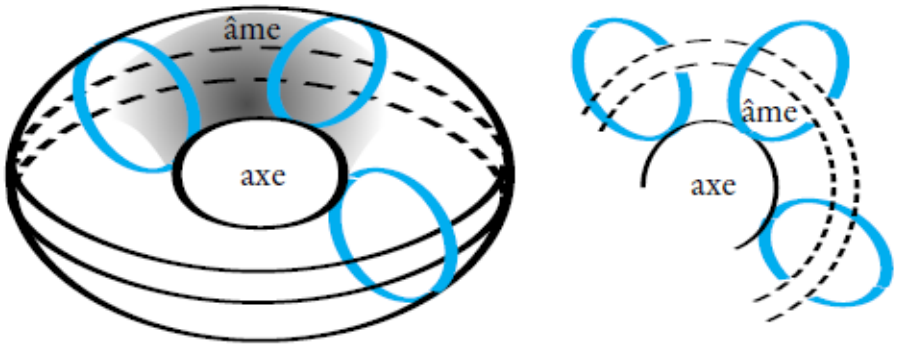

Fig. VIII-4

Soury: I will also need a board. It is a matter of the difference between the holing and the cutting of the torus and it is even a question of the difference between the reversal, the holing and the cutting.

So then I am going to try to present the difference between cutting and holing the torus, anyway first of all not worrying whether that can be used to make a reversal, simply cutting the torus and holing the torus how are they different. I draw a torus. I need different colour chalks. There you are.

So here we have the torus. On the torus, circles can be on the torus, they are reducible circles; reducible circles, are circles which by distortion can be reduced and there are non reducible circles. So that as a non reducible circle, there is the meridian circle, there are the longitudinal circles and there are other circles.

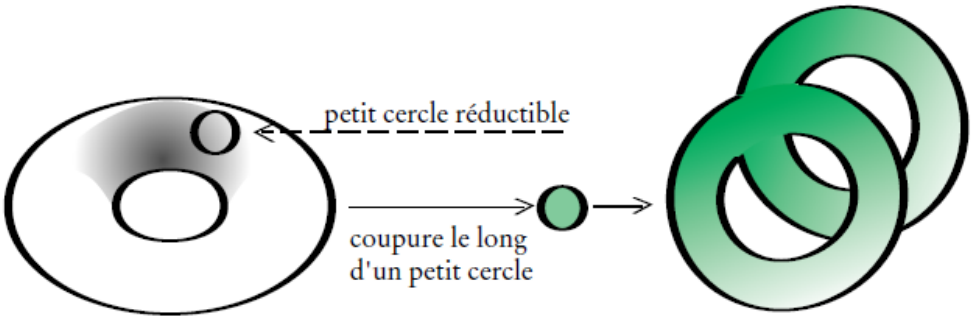

Fig. VIII-5

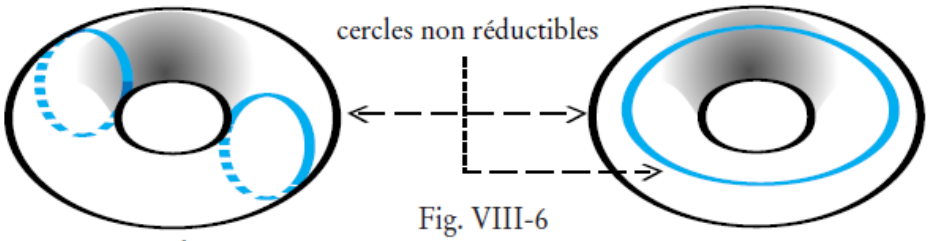

Fig. VIII-6

There you are. I drew a circle on the torus which is neither the meridian circle nor the longitudinal circle [VIII-7]. So then when there is a circle on the torus, it is possible to cut along the length of this circle and the result...

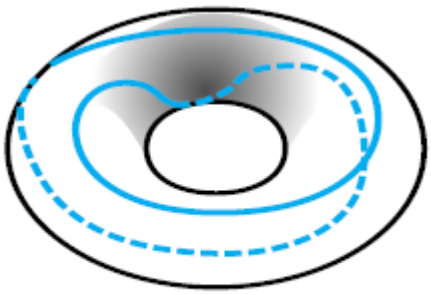

Fig. VIII-7

Good, so then the holing is this case, it is cutting along the reducible circle and the cut, is to cut along a non-reducible circle. If one cuts along a little circle, a reducible circle, a little circle, what remains? There remains on the one hand a piece, a little disc, this little disc, and on the other hand there remains a surface with an edge, a surface with an edge that I am drawing [VIII-8]. There you are. So then this drawing here represents a surface with an edge. Here is the result of the holing. To say holing, is not interesting oneself in the little disc which remains and to say that the holed torus is that. The holed torus is a surface with an edge which is drawn here.

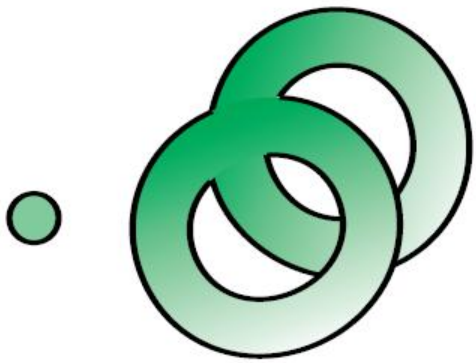

Fig. VIII-8

If the torus is cut along a non reducible circle, then that's the cut, so then what remains? First of all there remains just a single piece and I am going to say what remains there remains a strip more or less knotted and more or less twisted. So then I am going to draw the rest by a meridian cut.

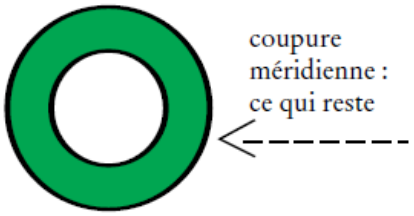

Fig. VIII-9

By a meridian cut, there remains a strip which is neither knotted nor twisted [VIII—9]. By a longitudinal cut also there remains the same thing: the strip which is neither knotted nor twisted [VIII-10]. And these also are surfaces with an edge. But there is all the same a difference: which is that there is a surface with a single edge and here there are surfaces with two edges.

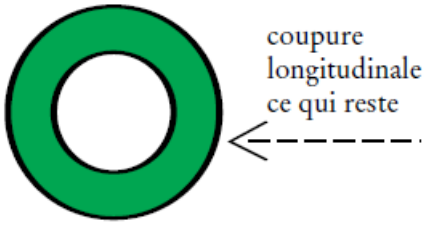

Fig. VIII-10

If the cut is made along a circle that is not so simple - not so simple as the meridian circle or the longitudinal circle - then what remains is a strip, there still remains a strip, but one that is more or less knotted more or less twisted. So that for example, anyway for a certain circle, one obtains a strip [VIII-11], which is knotted in a trefoil [[VIIII-12] and which is twisted. So then the torsion, I don't remember the corresponding torsion.

Therefore I am drawing it, I have every chance of making a mistake here, namely, that it is not just any torsion whatsoever, but I don't remember what torsion there is.

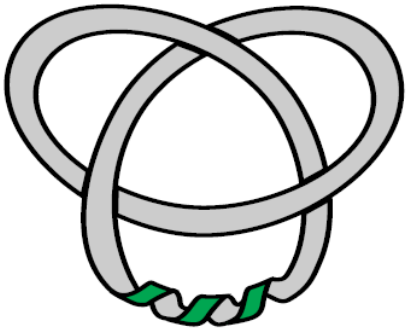

Fig. VIII-11

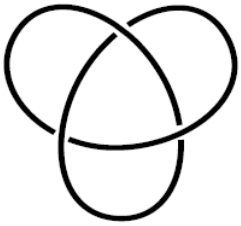

Fig. VIII-12

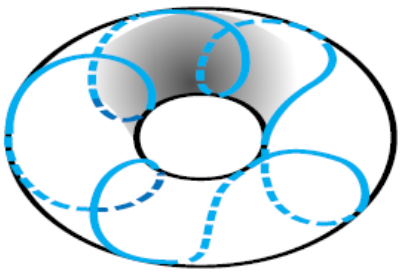
Anyway this is a strip which is knotted and twisted and one could separate its knotted part and its twisted part namely, the knotting of this strip can be represented by a knot, good here is the knot of the trefoil; and the torsion can be counted, it's a certain number of turns. In the case of the trefoil, there is a torsion of, I believe three turns, there are three turns of torsion; anyway if it's not three it's six I may be mistaken. Therefore here, I did not indicate these things in order to clearly show that what is in question are strips. Therefore the cut torus, is a strip that is more or less knotted, more or less twisted, therefore that gives certain knots, not all the knots, and it gives a certain torsion. There are certain circles on the torus that Mr Lacan has mentioned. These are the circles that he put in correspondence with Desire and Demand. Anyway here we are. These circles can be located by the number of times that they turn around the core and the number of times they turn around the axis. There are a lot of these circles but they can be located and this locating can be justified. So then the circles that Monsieur Lacan presented, are circles which turned only once, namely, around the axis or around the core and then several times...Here I am drawing one which turns a single time around the axis and several times around the core [VIII-13].

Fig. VIII-19



There I draw one which turns once around the axis and five times around the core. So then if the torus is cut according to a circles like that, the result is a strip which is twisted but which is not knotted namely, that the result, the torus cut along a circle like that, for this a 5: there are going to be five turns and no knotting, five turns of torsion and no knotting. Now I am making a mistake namely, that I am confusing turns and half turns I didn't draw enough of them [VIII-14].

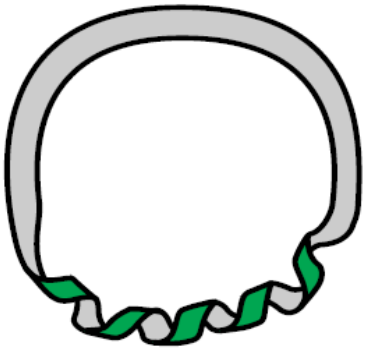
Fig. VIII-20



There you are. Good! No what I drew there, is a strip which is twisted and which is not knotted. Therefore the circles that Lacan mentioned among the circles on the torus, this was the meridian circle and the longitudinal circle which gives a strip that is neither knotted nor twisted and then these circles here correspond to desire/demand which gives a strip which is twisted and not knotted.

For the moment already that gives a difference between holing and cutting. So then here is the result of holing, there is only one way of holing while there are as many ways of cutting as there are of circles on the torus. So then here is the result of holing, here is the result of cutting. Here the result of holing, is a surface with an edge which is only a single edge. The result of cutting, are surfaces with two edges but it is a specially simple surface, since it is strip. That is already a way of showing the difference between holing and cutting: the fact is that the hole torus and the cut torus are not the same thing.

Now with respect to reversal, I am going to set about saying the differences between holing and cutting with respect to reversal.

First of all something, which is that cutting along a circle – I'm going to rub out a little here – let us say in the cut the holing is implicit namely, that in the cut the holing is implicit, namely, that in the cut there is much more than simply removing a little hole. The cut can be presented as something in addition with respect to holing namely, that one can make a holing first of all and starting from this holing, cut. The cut therefore can be decomposed in two phases: first holing and afterwards cutting starting from the holing. And therefore that can be done here, namely, that this is a holed torus, good, well then, the cut can be obtained...anyway, if it is considered to be in two stages: the first stage is to hole, the second stage to cut starting from the holed torus, the cut can be shown on this, namely, on the holed torus. So then I am going to show, I'm going to indicate, without drawing it, the simplest cuts. Let us make a meridian cut. In the holed torus, the distinction meridian/longitudinal distinction is lost. Anyway, let us make a meridian cut; that can be for example to cut here (1). Good, I am going to draw it all the same.

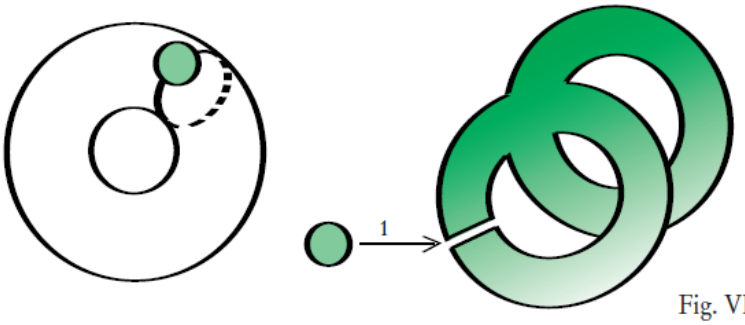

Fig. VIII-15

There you are let us make that, it's a meridian cut. While on this, one can see that there is only a strip remaining, namely, that once cut here, the cut here (1) leaves that. So then one can eventually imagine distortions on this in such a way that this can be reabsorbed and that can be reabsorbed and what remains is indeed a strip [VIII-9]. Therefore one can rediscover starting from the holed torus the meridian cut leaves a strip. Just as if this had been a longitudinal cut, the longitudinal cut would also have left a strip.

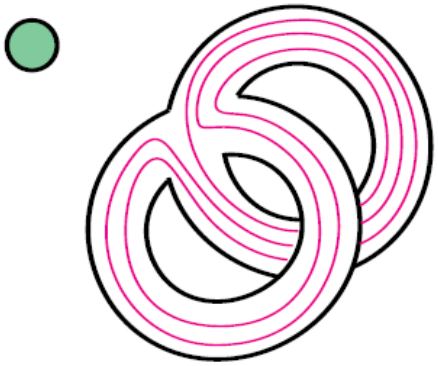

Fig. VIII-16

I am going to rub out this cut that I made there to draw a simpler cut, a cut along a circle which is not the simplest. So I'm going to make the cut, I'm going to draw a certain cut. I'm afraid of making a mistake all the same, so then I made a cut that starts again from the edge of the hole, anyway I made a cut which starts from the edge of the hole of the holing; so then I put this into gear. There you are, a circle [VIII-16]. Anyway, it's a circle which makes two turns around the axis, anyway two turns and three turns since, once the torus has been holed the distinction between the inside and the outside is lost and the distinction between the core and the axis is lost; lost, not completely lost, I will get there, but one cannot distinguish any longer meridian and longitudinal. So then I drew one cut of the holed torus and, starting from this drawing with some patience, it is possible to restore the knotted and twisted strip which will be obtained. By drawing the cut - it is drawn in red - on the holed torus by procedures of drawing one can manage to know the result of the cut. Namely, that here, I chose a circle which turns on the one hand twice and on the other hand three times because the result of this cut will be a trefoil knotting. That is a cut which is not the most simple and the result is a strip which is knotted and which is twisted. In the cut the holing is implicit; the holing is implicit.

One can say this differently; the fact is to cut the torus, is to do much more than hole it. Namely, that the space of the holing which is created is largely created on this occasion by a cut. Therefore everything that can be done by holing can be done by a cut. In particular the reversal that can be made by holing can be done by a cut.

But by cutting, there are other reversals which are possible. There are certain reversals which are not possible by holing and which are possible by cutting.

So then I am going to tell you the difference between the reversals permitted by the cut and permitted by holing. I am going to rub out the right hand part.

In order to distinguish that, some differentiation is needed, namely, that I need to differentiate the core and the axis by colours. So then I am going to use blue and red for this core and the axis; and I still need some differentiation, which is to differentiate the two faces of the torus. The torus is a surface without edges, it is a surface which has two faces and I need that differentiation. Good, so then here is the torus. One only sees a single one of its faces, I am going to use green and yellow for the two faces and here one sees only one face. For the torus, one sees only a single face, we do not see the inner yellow face.

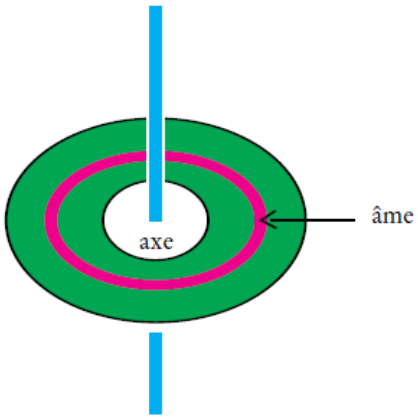

Fig. VIII-17

Therefore it's green and yellow the two faces of the torus and there is a correspondence between the core/axis couple and the couple of the two faces; there is a correspondence, namely, that the green face which is here the outside face is in correspondence with the axis and the yellow face the inner face is in correspondence with the core.

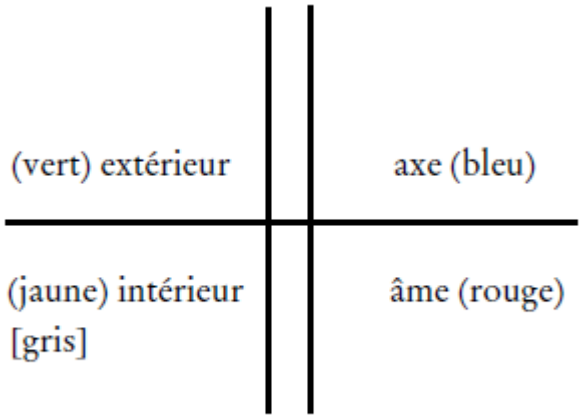

Fig. VIII-18

I am introducing two couples but these two couples are presently – because this is what is going to be lost – presently it is the couple with two faces and the inside/outside couple which are linked. So then the difference between cutting and holing, reversal by cutting /reversal by holing, can make a difference, anyway the difference, one difference, is that the reversal by holing does not touch, anyway does not change this link between the two faces with the inside/outside while the reversal by cutting dissociates this link.

So then the reversal by holing: what remains of it? In this presentation here of the torus that is holed one only sees a single one face, I am still taking the green face, this surface is now coloured these two faces are coloured there is a yellow face and a green face and in this plane presentation there is only a green face visible, the yellow face would appear by reversal, by the reversal of the plane. Pay attention here! I am talking about several reversals at once in this moment which is dangerous: I have just mixed up reversal of the plane and reversal of the torus. So then here is the holed torus. In the state of the holed torus I can represent the core and the axis as two axes. So then I am going to situate the core and the axis with respect to the holed torus. I have one chance in two of making a mistake (Laughter). The green face corresponds to the blue axis. I am placing here the axis, it's a straight line, this is the blue axis and now the red axis.

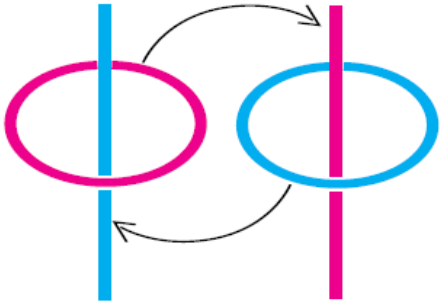

Fig. VIII-19

So why am I drawing two axes? There are reasons for that. I am going to tell you the reason for drawing the two axes for the holed torus. I'm going to rub out the left so that...so then in the original torus I am only preserving its core and its axis which are represented here. Once the torus is reversed it will have as core and as axis this; therefore the reversal of the torus, is the exchange of the core and the axis. It is the passage from that to that [VIII-19].

Well then the holed torus is a state of two axes, I am only affirming it; I am going to redraw it, finally I am only going to redraw what is here below, but I am going to redraw it here in the position of a hinge of an intermediary.

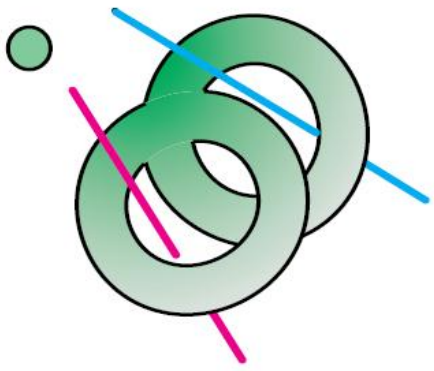

Fig. VIII-20

Here is the holed torus the surface with two axes [VIII-20]. And I will mention another version of it, which is that if one only keeps the circle edge of that namely, that one only keeps the edge, the fact is – I am going to draw it still in the middle – there you are: this is to preserve the two axes of the torus which are here in blue and red and the circle at the edge of the hole [VIII-21].

Here it is to preserve the surface with the edge [VIII-20] and here [VIII-21] it is to preserve only one minus the edge. So then what's in the middle here acts as hinge in the operation of reversal of exchange between the core and the axis.

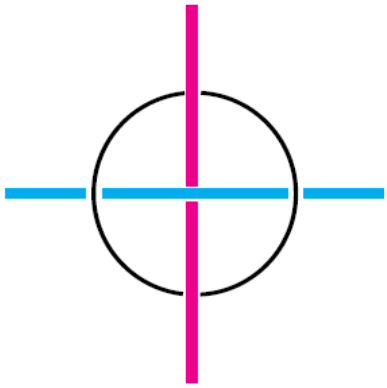

Fig. VIII-21

So then I'm mentioning this figure here because there is a Borromean configuration, namely, that the inside and the outside and the edge of the hole form a Borromean configuration. Finally I only affirmed that in this intermediary state the core and the axis were both able...At the moment of this intermediary state which is the state of indetermination, the hinge between the inside and the outside. Namely, that here the inside and the outside are differentiated and that here the inside and the outside are not differentiated. Here the inside/outside couple is in a state of vacillation or, in the case of the holed torus, the inside/outside distinction is lost.

So then this was dealing with the holed torus. Now I am going to rub out this schema, the schema of correspondence, even though I may have need of the starting schema of correspondence between the couple of two faces and the inside/outside couple. So then there is a green which corresponds to the blue and then yellow which corresponds to the red. So then when the torus is cut, it is going...but there, from memory I don't know how they are arranged...therefore I am going to draw it...Eventually I am wrong. But this won't trouble me at all for what I need. I'm going to draw a cut torus, I'm going to draw it like a knotted and twisted strip. Here I am in the process of redrawing a knotted and twisted strip that is obtained by cutting the torus. There you are. While to indicate that it is a strip, I am putting these little lines but I am not going to put these little lines everywhere.

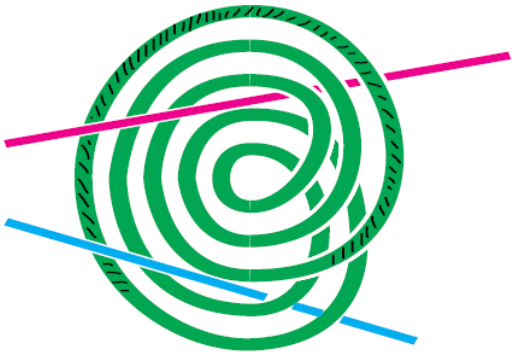

Fig. VIII-22

There you are that's the drawing of a knotted and twisted strip obtained by cutting the torus. There you are. So I am going stop drawing these little lines. The core and the axis are now here; what was previously the core and the axis – now there are two axes – are found...It's a pity I don't have enough space...so then there you are the two inside and outside axes and now a couple of two faces. So then this strip, as it is drawn, once again has only one face, and this is not by chance, namely, that I am systematically privileging drawings where one sees only one face. Therefore there we have the knotted and twisted strip with a yellow face and a green face here one only sees its green face. There you are. So then I am going all the same to draw the two faces, in the case here, to show the two cases in a different case

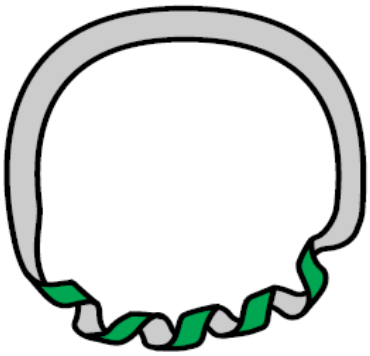

Fig. VIII-14

The fact is that here I had previously drawn a strip that was not knotted and which was twisted, so here one sees the two faces, namely, that in the case of a torsion one sees another face, namely, that in this part here one sees yellow, there is yellow and green. Anyway that's to show that in a drawing of a surface with an edge, the two faces may appear. It is by chance that in certain drawings one only sees the same face. So here therefore here are the two axes that were previously the inside and the outside and the cut torus: this strip. Well then, I don't know whether it is imaginable that inside this the couple of yellow and of green have become independent from the couple of blue and red, namely, that this strip, all of this is only one strip and one can also give it a half twist along its length and it will always be the same object and the yellow face plays the same role as the green face. So then in that situation of the torus cut with its two axes, the couple of two faces green and yellow and the couple inside/outside, blue and red have become independent. This indicates something about the difference of the two reversals, which is that, in the reversal by holing one exchanges the inside and the outside one exchanges the two faces and they interchange together namely, that at the moment when the inside/outside couples exchange, this exchanges the two faces. Namely, if this torus coloured yellow and green when one reverses it, if it were the green outside afterwards it would be the yellow outside.

In the reversal by holing one simultaneously inverts the two faces and the inside/outside. On the contrary the reversal by cutting allows there to be disassociated this liaison, namely, that once the torus is cut, it can be closed, not by...I am going to say this differently: the fact is that instead of seeing the holed torus or the torus cut as an intermediary I'm going to describe it differently, the fact is that the holed torus can be closed in two different ways. The cut torus for its part closed in four different ways. Anyway I hesitate between two fashions of formulating it: one way in which the holed torus or the cut torus appear as an intermediary between the two states of the torus and another way of talking of the two states of the torus being described as two ways of closing this surface with the edge. So then once the torus is cut it is possible to close it in many ways, namely, that it is possible to close it as it was at the beginning, as it was at the beginning, namely, with a blue outside axis and a green outside face, but it is possible to close it in any way whatsoever namely, it is possible to close it with the red outside axis and with the green or yellow outside face. Namely, that there are four ways of closing this torus that has been cut but combining in every possible way the blue red couple to fix the blue red couple as inside/outside, as a core and an axis and to fix the green yellow couple as inside and outside face.

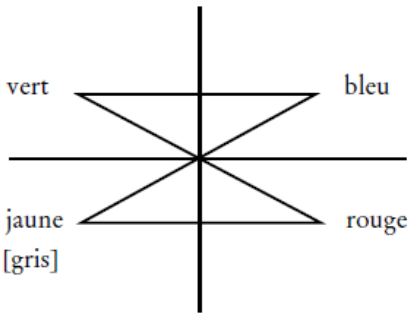

Fig. VIII-23

So then it's a matter of couples, of binaries (Laughter). I find it rather difficult to present these considerations with exactness. There I embarked in...anyway it was the holing and the cutting. Anyway this business of couples or of binaries are always linked to the business of inexactitude.

Lacan: The green can be associated to the blue and to the red...

Soury: Yes yes.

Lacan: And on the other hand the yellow can be associated also with the blue and the red.

Soury: Yes, yes.

X: But is what you're saying true also for a simple cut, like a meridian cut and a longitudinal cut?

Soury: Yes, yes.

Y: Namely, the separation between the green and the yellow and the axis and the core is also true for a simple cut.

Soury: Quite.

X: Because there you showed it for a complex cut but you could also have shown it for a simple cut.

Soury: Yes, that's true for it is the same thing for a meridian cut and for a longitudinal cut, that it produces the same thing as the cut in general, namely, the dissociation of the couple of two faces and of the inside/outside couple.

X: Could you not show it on a simple meridian cut?

Soury: Yes yes, it's indeed....

Lacan: Who sent me this paper? It is someone who attended what Soury was doing in practical work.

Second X: It's me.

Lacan: Who is it? It is you two? Listen I am very interested by this object A and the other that you designate by a star, I mean the A object and the object which is drawn like that. I am very interested and I would really like to know what you have understood by what Soury has explained today. If you were to come to tell me I'd be very happy.

X: There what Soury showed is effectively an error that was in the paper.

Lacan: What? In the paper in the paper that you sent me?

X: Namely, that it was not effectively a reversal by a hole but a reversal by a cut.

Lacan: That's it. Good I am very happy to know that because I was racking my brains about that error. Now then I think Soury has fulfilled all our wishes and I will continue the next time.

Lacan to Soury: Come and see me.

Annexe to Session VIII

Pages distributed by Soury probably 21 February or 14 March

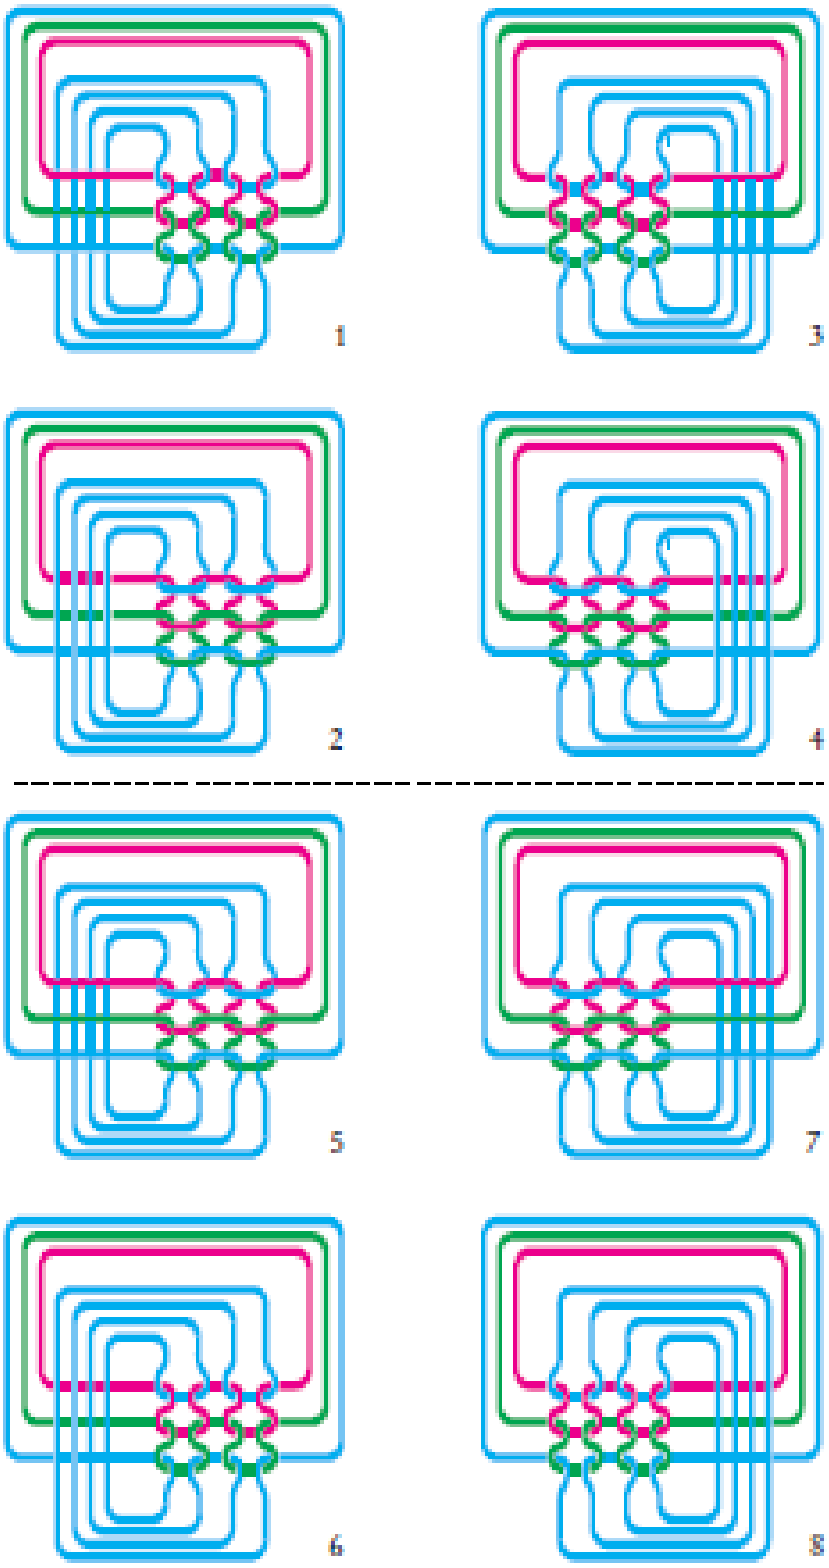

Fig. VIII-a — schémas « carrés » ou « peignes ».

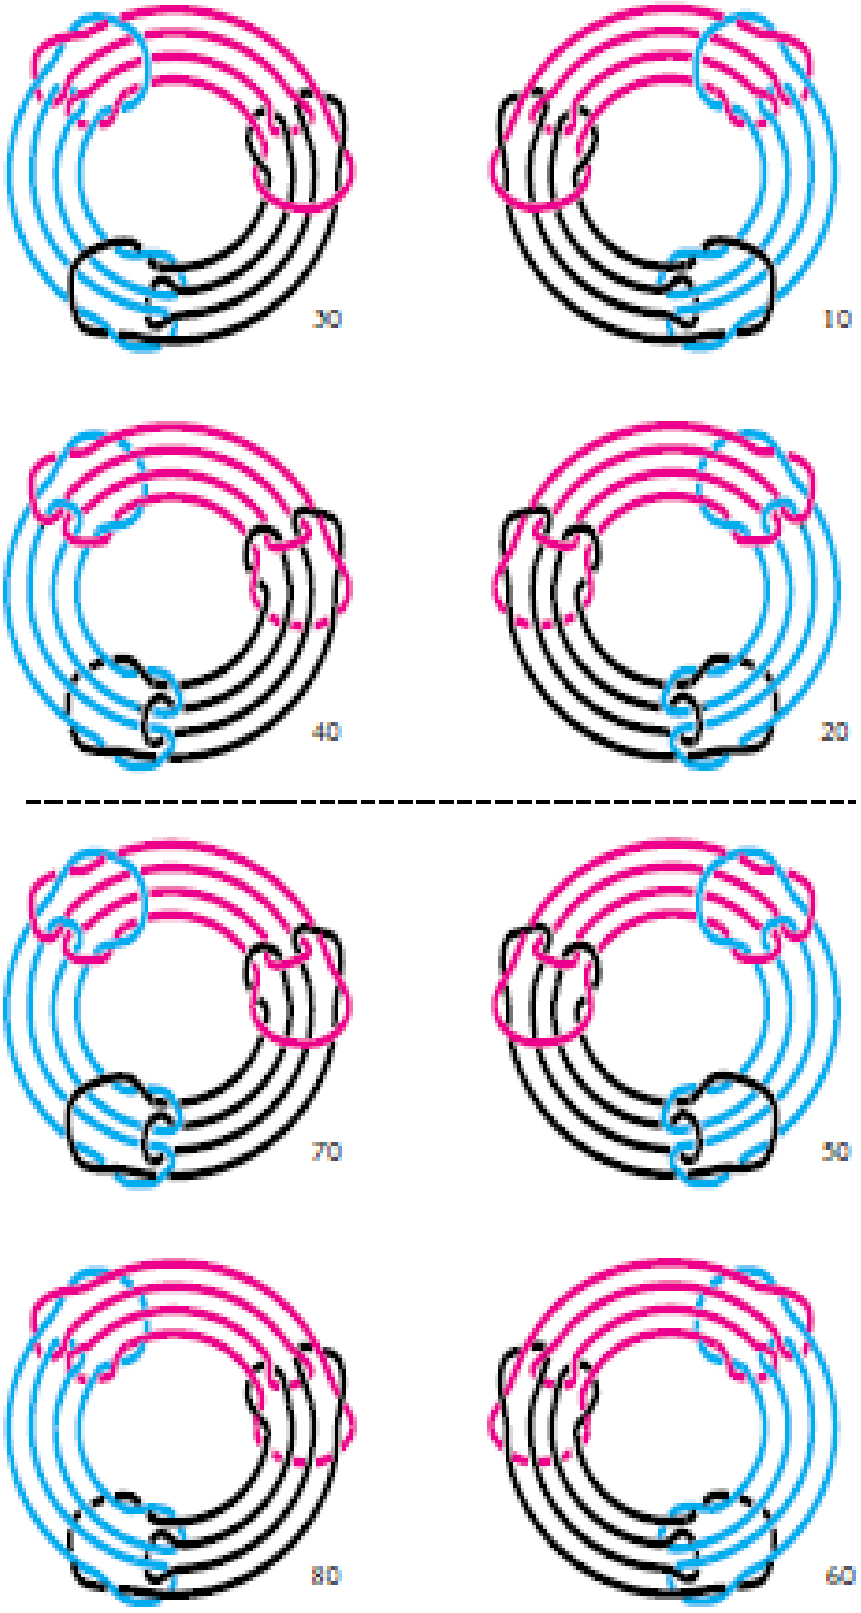

Fig. VIII-b — Schémas « ronds » ou « cercles ».

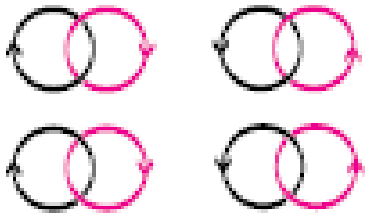
Le moment de conclure

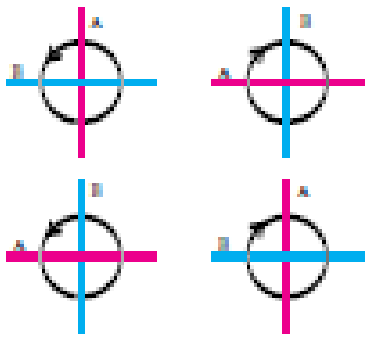
Les deux trèfles.

Ce sont des nœuds. Ils sont échangés par 2 automorphismes. Les présentations planes sont échangées par 4 automorphismes.



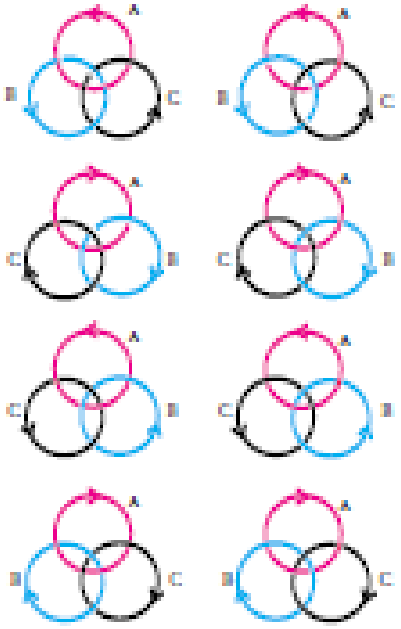
Les deux enlacements.

Ce sont des chaînes orientées. Ils sont échangés par 4 automorphismes. Les présentations planes régulières sont échangées par 8 automorphismes.



Les deux chaînes boroméennes de deux droites colorées et un cercle orienté.

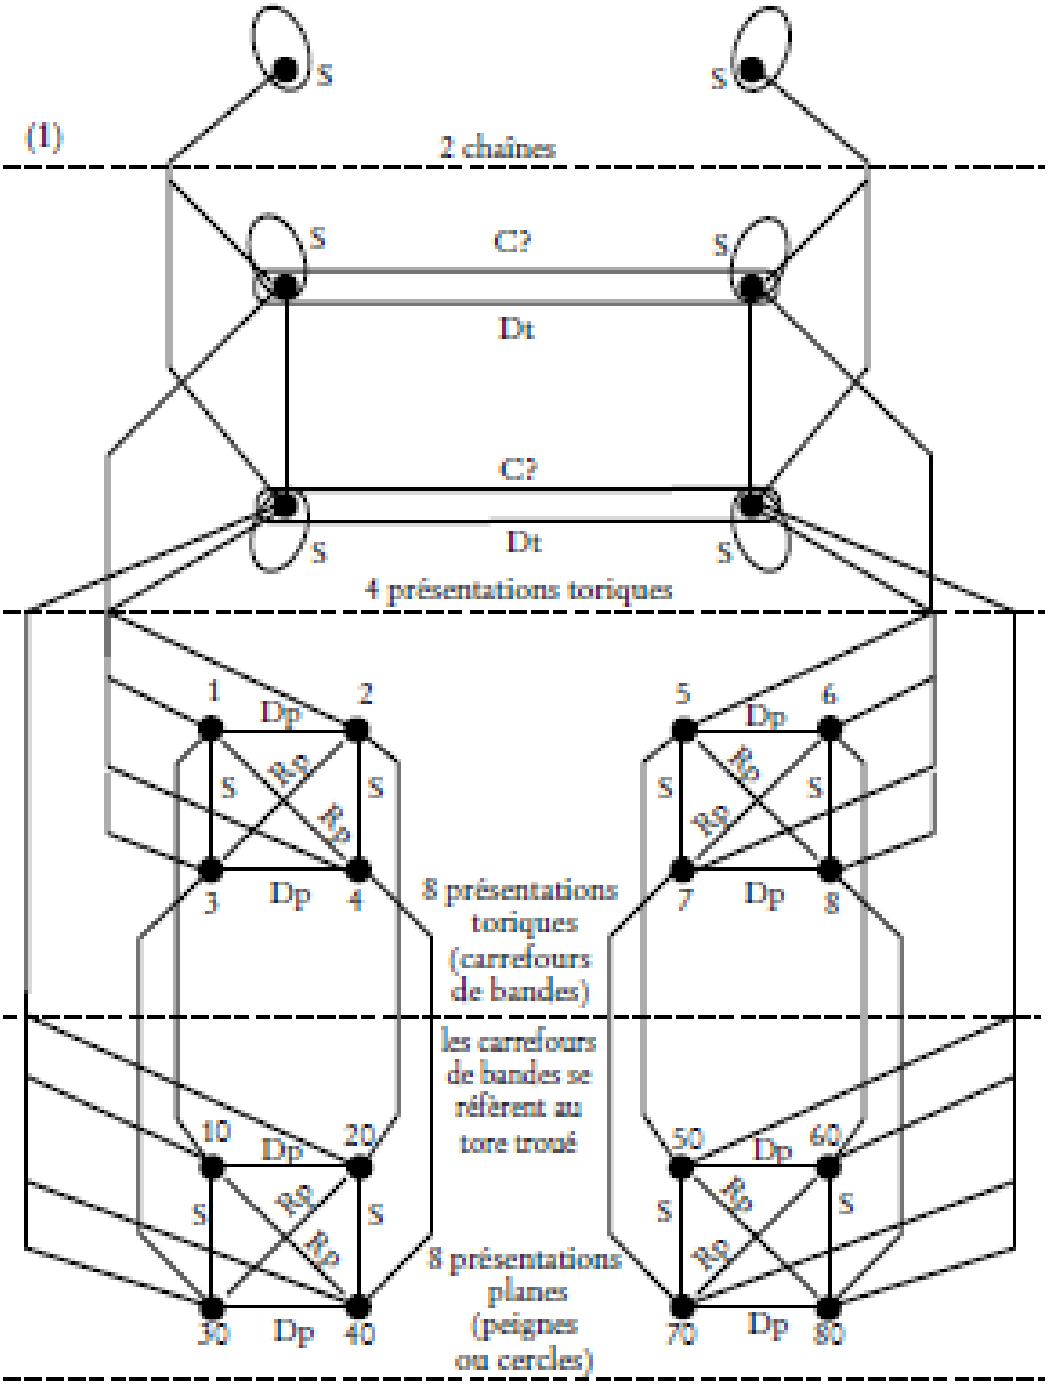
Ce sont des chaînes de deux droites colorées par A et B et de un cercle orienté. Ils sont échangés par 8 automorphismes. Les présentations planes sont échangées par 16 automorphismes.



Les deux chaînes boroméennes de trois cercles colorés orientés.

Ce sont des chaînes de trois cercles colorés par A et B et orientés. Les présentations planes régulières sont échangées par 48 automorphismes.

Fig. VIII-c



S = symétrie
Rt = retournement de tores
Dt = échanger les dessus/dessous sur le tore
C = retournement du tore par coupure. Quelle est la généralité de cette opération?

Rp = retournement de plan
Dp = échanger les dessus/dessous sur le plan (artifice)
(1) retournement se référant au tore troué

Fig. VIII-d — Diagramme affiché au tableau par Soury

21.3.78 (CG Draft 2)

Seminar 9: Tuesday 21 March 1978

I am warning you that Madam Ahrweiler, President of the University of Paris 1, Madam Ahrweiler has taken steps to ensure that I will give my seminar the 11th and 18th of April. This is a vacation period and therefore you will probably just have to enter by the door not on rue St Jacques, but on the place du Pantheon. In fact I was reduced to two seminars since, as regards May, it would be the 2nd Tuesday, but not the 3rd, given that I have been warned that in this very room there will be exams on the 3rd Tuesday.

It nevertheless remains that I am very concerned about what is involved specifically in the torus. Soury is going to pass you tori, tori on which there is something knitted. There is something that particularly worries me, which is the relationship between what can be called toricity and holing. It seems, according to what Soury says, that there is no relationship between holing and toricity. For my part, I cannot say that I do not see relationships, but probably I have a rather confused idea about what can be called a torus.

Last time you had a certain presentation of what one can do with a torus. There is something that Soury is going to pass around later and which involves a holing. It is a holing which is artificial, I mean that it is a torus covered by a knitting which is richer than the simple one, namely the one which is – and that indeed is where the difficulty is – the which is traced out as knitting on the torus. I have not dissimulated from you what this involves: the fact that it is traced out on the torus is of such a nature that one cannot, what I designate as 'a tracing out', cannot be passed as a knitting. It nevertheless remains that by convention, people think, and articulate that it is a knitting. But there should be added to this, this complement that what can be traced out on the other side of the surface has by being inverted and by being inverted by highlighting the inversion of above/ below, which of course frankly complicates what we can say about what is happening inside the torus. This indeed is what manifests itself in the relative complexity of what is drawn at this level. (On Soury's picture, 3rd and 4th levels in the annexe of the previous session). We will agree to say that the inversion of the above/below complicates the affair, because what I called earlier the complexity of this picture has nothing to do with this inversion that one can agree to call, because it is inside the torus instead of being outside, that one can call, by definition its mirror-image. This would mean that there are toric mirrors. It is a simple question of definition. It is a fact that it is what is on the outside that passes for important, outside of the torus, traced outside the torus. There is no trace in these figures (Soury's picture: levels 3 and 4), there is no trace of this inversion, that I called the image in a toric mirror.

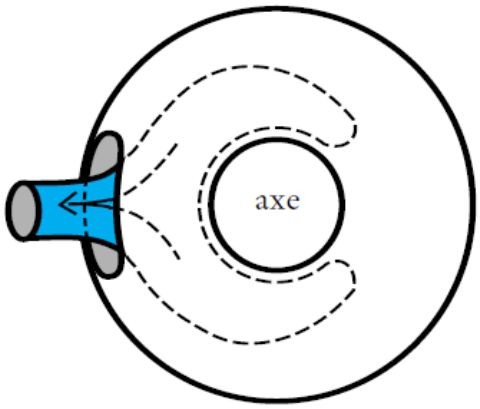

Fig. IX-1

Holing is a means of reversal. By holing it is possible for a hand to be introduced and go on to grasp the axis of the torus and, in that way, reversing it; but there is something else that is possible, which is that through this hole by pushing through the hole the whole of the torus, one obtains a reversal effect. This is what Soury will show you later with the help of a toric knitting that is a little more complicated.

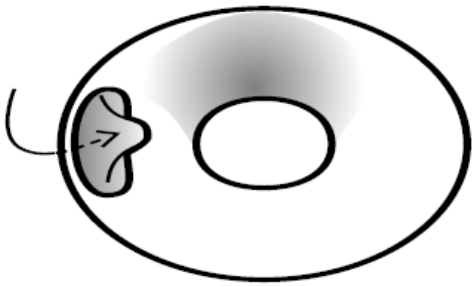

Fig. IX-2

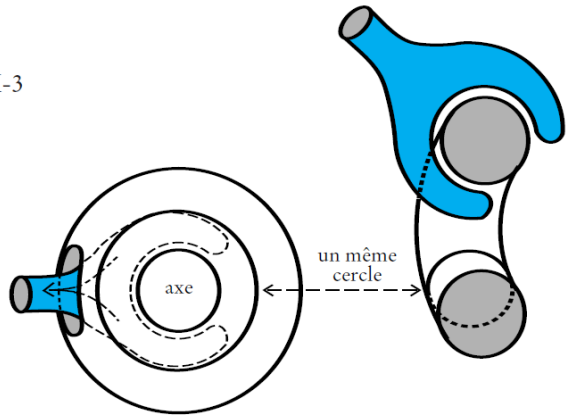
It is striking that one obtains by pushing the outside of the torus, that one obtains exactly the same result, which I justify by saying that this hole by definition does not properly speaking have a dimension, namely that it is thus that it can be presented, namely that what is a hole here can moreover be projected in the following way.

Fig. IX-3



What will present itself therefore as a grasping of the axis here will find itself inverted; the grasping of the axis will ensure that this will be outside the hole but that, since there is an inversion of the torus, the grasping of the axis will ensure that the torus – this is also a simple circle and will be found here after the axis has been grasped - but inversely one can see that here we will obtain the same figure namely that what is here caught by the hole and this pushed back inside, after the inversion of what is here, will also find itself functioning as a torus, what is here becoming the axis.

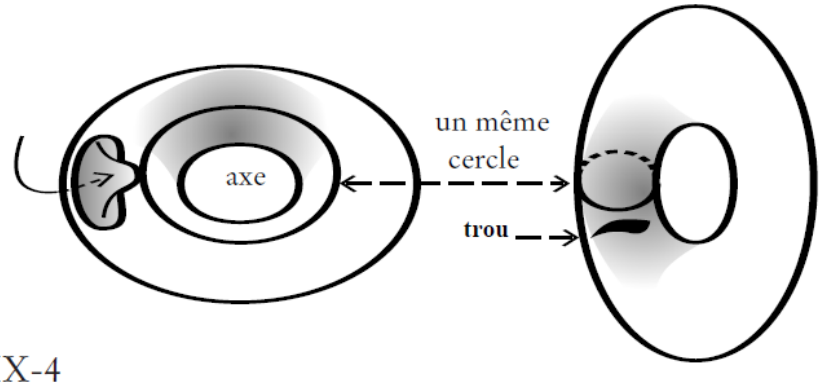


Fig. IX-4

I am now going to ask Soury, since he is good enough to be here, to come and show the difference – a null difference – that there is between these two ways of depicting the toric knitting.

You have the object?

Soury: I passed it around.

Lacan: You have passed it around. One can see on this object the difference there is between grasping the axis and pushing back the whole torus. Off you go.

Soury: Will I go ahead? So then it is a matter of reversing the torus by holing. I am going to present it in the following way namely that it is a torus which is grafted onto an infinite plane. This drawing here indicates that there is a torus which is grafted by a pipe onto an infinite plane. Inside this, what corresponds to holing is this pipe part which carries out at once a holing of the torus and a holing of the infinite plane and for that reason, it is similar.

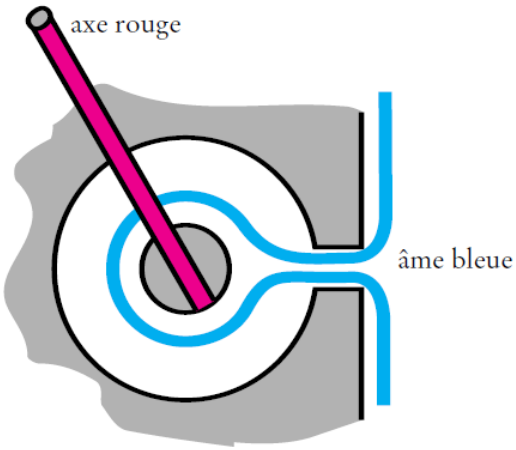

Fig. IX-5

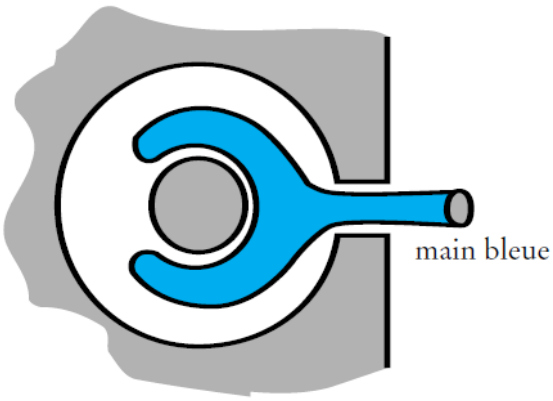

Fig. IX-6

So then inside, space is divided in two halves and this surface has two faces...one face that I draw here by hairs [in grey on the drawing], hairs on the surface, is here; here there is one face and there there is another face. Good! The space is divided into two halves, one half of the space, the half which is here on the left of this infinite plane and which is outside the torus and which acts as an axis for this torus; and in the other half, anyway the other half of this infinite plane is in communication with the inside of the torus and here I am drawing something which constitutes the core. So then this configuration here allows there to be indicated the before and after of the reversal. Here I am in the process of redrawing the same thing and it is what is in front. And after the reversal...then I show the two faces by the same indication.

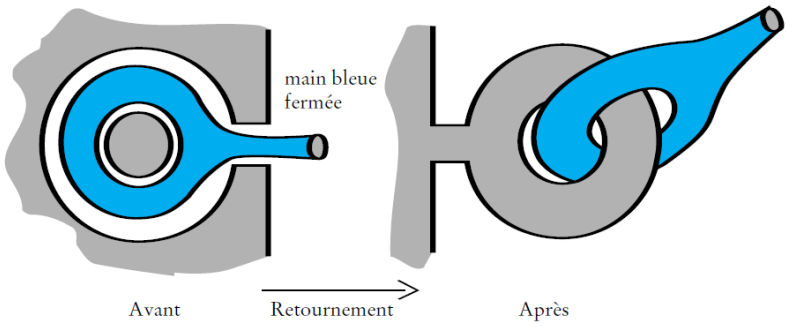

Fig. IX-7

Therefore here is what constituted the outside face, the left face of the plane in front, and now, which after still constitutes the left face of the plane, but which constitutes the inner face of the torus, namely that in the reversal what was an outside face of the torus has become an inside face.

So then that's a kind of glove. Anyway this reversal, is something comparable to the reversal of a glove. It is all the same not quite a glove, it is a toric glove, it's a glove which grasps, it is a glove which closes and which grasps. Now this glove which closes and which grasps can be reversed and that becomes again a glove which closes and a which grasps. So then a description that was given earlier, I am going to draw a hand in blue like that which comes to grasp here... Good, this blue hand – this couple there of ochre and of blue [in red on IX-5] is an inside outside couple – this blue hand which has just grasped, which uses this glove, namely that this toric glove gloves this blue hand and in that way this blue hand grasps, can grasp the axis which is ochre here (in red), this hand which has just used this glove as a glove and in this way grasped the ochre axis. The reversal can, at that moment, be described in the following way, which is that this blue hand pulls, pulls...and how is it going to find itself? Finally this hand is going to be found like that [IX-7].

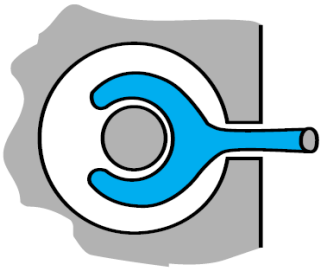

Fig. IX-8

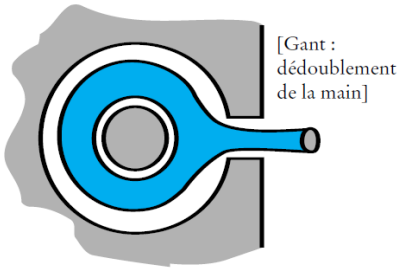

Fig. IX-9

This hand I am going to draw out in full, here's the hand which grasps and the arm of this hand is found here. And already now I have slightly changed the drawing of the hand, namely that I have drawn this hand in the style of a hand which grasps, namely I no longer like there left an indication that the fingers were not closed [IX-6]. I drew the hand in two different ways, I am now going to modify the drawing of the hand here to indicate that it is a hand which grasps, therefore I indicate it as a closed hand [IX-9]. There you are.

I therefore modified the drawing of the hand as a closed hand, a hand which grasps. There you are. Therefore here its relationship with the torus, is that it is gloved by this torus, and here its relation to the torus, is that it is in the situation of a handshake with the torus, namely that from the hand to the torus here it is like handshake, namely that from the hand to the torus is to go here from a situation of reduplication, that the glove is a reduplication of the hand, and here in a situation of complementarity, namely that these two hands which are in a handshake complement one another, anyway they are two complementary tori two interlaced tori, the hand which grasps being itself a torus.

Therefore here is the before and the after of the reversal. While in the reversal, anyway the reversal therefore can be specified by the situation of this hand, whether it is gloved, or whether it gives a handshake. This can specify the reversal, but it is not indispensible for indicating the reversal, namely that the reversal can be indicated...if this hand did not figure, if this hand were absent, the reversal can be depicted all the same, it is to push all of that into the hole.

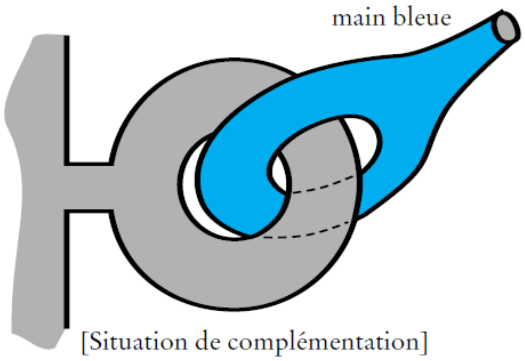

Fig. IX-10

The reversal of this toric glove can be carried out by pushing it into the hole, namely the passage from the before to the after which is here does not need to be defined by a hand which grasps, which pull and which is found like that there. This hand inside first which becomes a complementary hand, is not indispensible, the reversal can be defined as simply pushing this whole part there, the toric part, pushing it into the hole and it is enough to push it into the hole for it to be found on the other side. In other words, the grasping here does indeed contribute to describing the reversal. The passage from the gloving to the handshake, in other words the passage from the reduplication of the torus to the complementarity of the torus, therefore the grasping inside, which serves to indicate, which indicates, the fact is that on the particular location of the reversal, there is a passage from reduplication to interlacing; but that is not indispensible for...The hand, inside, only shows the complementary torus; the hand inside stands for the complementary torus. But the reversal can be carried out even if the complementary torus is not present and by pushing all of that. Indeed by pushing all of that through the hole, gives this, namely that it is not...one can moreover push thewhole, one can push the torus and the hand and that will give this, namely that inside the hand which grasps is only a reduplication of the torus... which then is not indispensible for the reversal, namely that the difference between the description without the hand or with the hand, is the difference between carrying out the reversal of a torus which is white here or of a torus reduplicated by a blue torus.

So then I am drawing the two descriptions of the reversal [IX-11]– except that I have just made an error, here it is in blue – I am redrawing what was previously drawn, namely previously this torus with its outside here. Here is the outside face of the torus which is reversed like that, the outside face becomes the inside. And here it is the same thing, but the torus is reduplicated by the hand. And here then, there you are. Therefore there are two presentations, two neighbouring descriptions of reversal, in one case the isolated torus, in the other case the torus with its double, the double which is, either the double by reduplication, or the double by interlacing, the double by reduplication being able to be imaged as the situation of gloving and the double by interlacing being able to be imaged by the situation of a handshake. Good. There you are.

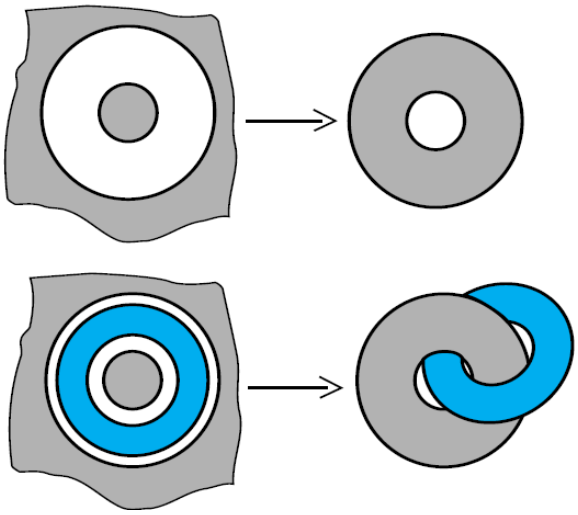

Fig. IX-11

Ribettes: could you situate the position of the axis?

Soury: So then the axis here, I can add it on. Therefore the gloved hand grasps the axis. On the occasion of the reversal, the axis is going to become the core. So then the axis is here. And after the reversal it has become the soul, the axis here is there and after the reversal it has become core, the axis here is there and after reversal it has become core.

X: Why the image of the handshake, it has such a....

Soury: Why the image of the handshake...

X: It seems so...?

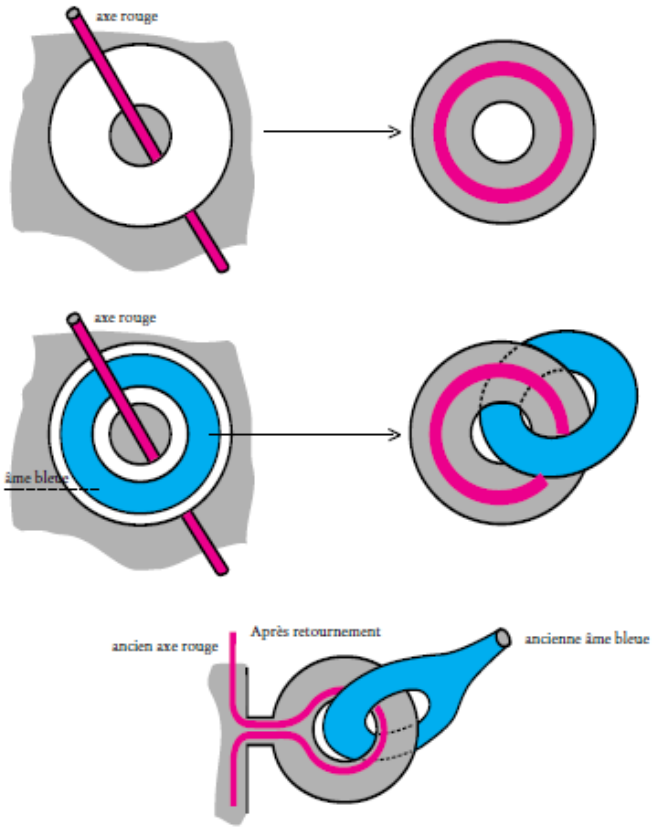

Fig. IX-12

Soury: Why does the image of the handshake seem so....hard? Well, the handshake is completely closed. They are rings which are closed. And the only choice is between the handshake or gloving; anyway in that suppleness only allows going from the handshake to gloving. It does not allow...Anyway, what are hands which open and which close, I know nothing about. There, they are only toric hands, closed hands.

Lacan: You consider that it is a matter of pushing? In this way of doing things, it cannot be simply pushing the whole of the torus. That is why you spoke earlier about the whole of the torus.

Soury: Yes, yes.

Lacan: Good, I'm going to remain there for today. Rendezvous on the 11th April.

Seminar 10: Tuesday 11 April 1978

I stated, putting it in the present, that there is no sexual relationship. It is the foundation of psychoanalysis. At least that is what I have allowed myself to say. There is no sexual relationship, except for neighbouring generations, namely, the parents on the one hand, the children on the other. This is what is warded off – I am talking about sexual relationship – this is what is warded off by the prohibition of incest. Knowledge, is always in relationship with what I write 'l'asexe', on condition of following it up with a word which is to be put in parenthesis 'ualité': l'asexe (ualité). One has to know how to deal with this sexuality. To know comme enfer [a play on comment faire, how to deal with] this at least is how I write it. I began at one time, to symbolise this sexuality, to make a Möbius strip. I would like now to correct this strip, I mean by that to triple it.

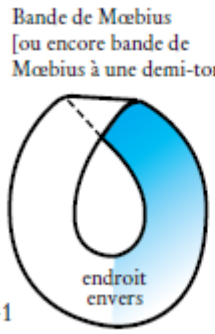

Fig. X-1

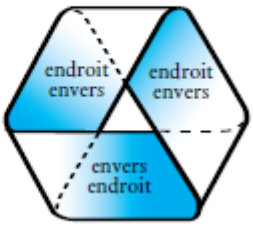

Fig. X-2

This is a strip, just like the other one, namely, that its front coincides with its back, but this time that happens twice. It is easy for you to see, if this is the front, this which turns is the back, following which one comes back to the front; and after that, the back is here, just as here where the back was, is the front; and in the same way here the front is the back. It is therefore a double Möbius strip, I mean that it is on the same face that the front and the back appear.

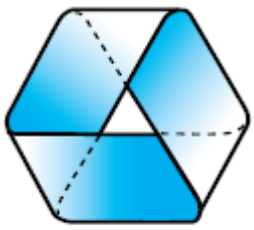

Fig. X-3

Here we can say that it is simpler: if this is the front, it is also the back, as appears from the fact that what was the back here returns there; namely, that the Möbius strip has only one front and one back. But the distinction between this [X-2] and this [X-1] comes from the fact that it is possible to have a Möbius strip which, on its two faces, is at the same time the front and the back. There is a single face on each side: it's a Mobius strip which has the property of being bilateral.

What does one lose in the abstraction? One loses the fabric, one loses the stuff, namely, that one loses what is presented as a metaphor. Moreover, I point out to you, the art, the art by which one weaves, the art is also a metaphor. That is why I strive to make a geometry of fabric, of thread, of stitching. This at least is where the fact of analysis has led me; for analysis is a fact, a social fact at least, which is founded on what is called thought that one expresses as one can with lalangue that people have – I recall that I wrote this lalangue in a single word in the drawing in order to make something felt in it. In analysis, one does not think just anything whatsoever and nevertheless this indeed is what one tends to in the association described as free: one would like to think anything whatsoever. Is that what we do? Is that what dreaming consists in? In other words: do we dream about the dream? Because that is where the objection lies. The objection is that Freud in The interpretation of dreams does no better: about the dream, by free association about the dream, he dreams. How know where to stop in the interpretation of dreams? It is quite impossible to understand what Freud meant in The interpretation of dreams. This is what made me rave, it has to be said, when I introduced linguistics into what is called a quite effective paste, at least we suppose it to be so, and which is called analysis. 'From syntax to interpretation', this is what Jean-Claude Milner proposes to us. It is certain that he has all kinds of difficulties in going from syntax to interpretation. What was the state of things in Freud's time? There is obviously a question of atmosphere as one says, of what are called cultural co-ordinates. I mean that one remains with thoughts and acting by means of thought, it is something which is close to mental defectiveness. There must exist an act which is not mentally defective. I try to produce this act in my teaching. But it is all the same only stammering. We are close here to magic. Analysis is a magic which only has as support the fact that, certainly, there is no sexual relationship, but that thoughts are oriented, are crystallised on what Freud imprudently called the Oedipus complex. All that he was able to do, is to find in what was called tragedy, in the sense that this word had a sense, what was called tragedy furnished him, in the form of a myth, something which articulates that one cannot prevent a son from killing his father.

I mean by that that Laïus did everything he could to distance this son about whom a prediction had been made, that did not prevent him for all that, and I would say all the more so, from being killed by his own son.

I believe that by working on psychoanalysis, I made it progress. But in reality, I am breaking it apart. How direct a thought so that analysis works? The thing which is closest to it, is to convince oneself, if this word has a meaning, is to convince oneself that it works. I tried to flatten it out. It is not easy.

In the passage from the signifier, as it is understood, to the signified there is something that is lost, in other words, it is not sufficient to state a thought for it to work. To raise psychoanalysis to the dignity of surgery, for example, would be highly desirable. But it is a fact that the thread of thought in it does not suffice. What does that mean moreover the thread of thought? It is also a metaphor. This indeed is why I was also led to something that is also a metaphor, namely, to materialise this thread of thoughts. I was encouraged by something which basically is what I was saying at the beginning, namely, this triplicity which founds the fact of the succession of generations. There are three of them, three generations between which there is something of a sexual relationship. This brings with it of course a whole series of catastrophes and this is what Freud, when all is said and done, noticed. He noticed it, but this was not seen in his familial life; because he had taken the precaution of being madly in love with what is called a woman, it must be said, it is bizarre, it is strange. Why does desire go on to love? Facts do not allow it to be explained. There are no doubt effects of prestige. What is called social superiority must play a role in it; in any case for Freud it's very likely. The trouble is he knew it. He noticed that this effect of prestige was operating, at least it's very likely that he noticed it. Was Freud – the question must be asked all the same, was Freud religious? It is certain that it is worthwhile posing the question. Do all men fall under the weight (faix) of being religious? It is all the same curious that there is something which is called mysticism: mysticism which is a plague as is clearly proved by all of those who fall into mysticism.

I imagine that analysis, I mean inasmuch as I practice it, is something that made me limited. Analysis it must be said is an excellent method for cretinisation. But perhaps I tell myself that I am limited because I dream, I dream of being a little less so.

Fig. X-4

Flattening out something, whatever it may be, is always useful. There is something which is striking, which is that flattening out this, one notices that this is nothing other than a threefold thread, I mean that this is exactly identical to this threefold thread.

Flattened out it is the same thing as this threefold thread. It does not seem to be so, but nevertheless this indeed is what is at stake. The threefold thread, I mean what is properly speaking a knot, a knot that is said to have three points of intersection, this is what flattens out our Mobius strip. I would ask you to consider this and allow me to remain with that.

Seminar 11: Tuesday 18 April 1978

Come a little closer, because you have sent me things.

I would like you to comment, like that, one by one, on the things you have sent me, because there is something wrong. I am pointing out to you that what I drew for you the last time, in the form of this strip which I made as best I could, if one cuts it in two, the result – if one cuts it in two like that – the result is what is called a three-fold knot, namely, something which is presented like that.

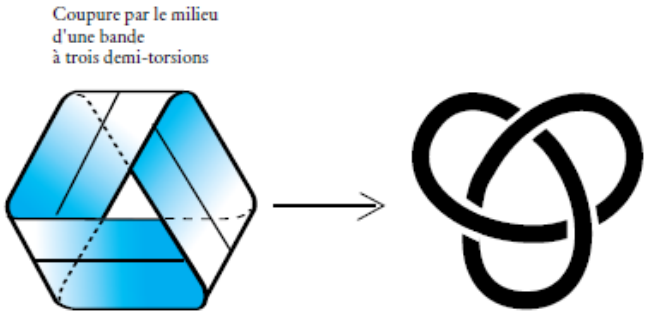

Fig. XI-1 Fig. XI-2

It is of course, quite striking. Here [XI-3], is what is called a Moebius strip. I am drawing it again because it is worthwhile noticing because, thanks to what is called elasticity...the Moebius strip is drawn like that. In other words, one reverses what appears in this form.

Fig. XI-3

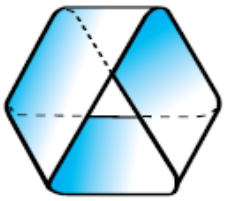

Fig. XI-4

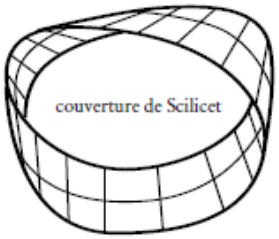
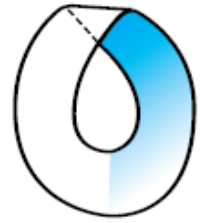


The present form is the one that appears on the cover of Scilicet. But the real Moebius strip is that one.

Fig. XI-5



bande de Mœbius
à une demi-torsion

And there is what Jean-Claude Terrasson who is here and who is helping me, it is what Jean-Claude Terrasson very legitimately calls a half-twist and there, in the form that I made function the last time – since this is what I drew for you the last time – there are three half-twists. On the contrary it is possible to make just one twist. This is what is manifested in figure 2 [XI-5], where there is effectively a single twist. Figure 2 can also be depicted thus [XI-3].

bande de Mœbius
à trois demi-torsions

Fig. XI - 6

bande à deux demi-torsions ou une torsion complète

Fig. XI - 7

This is a figure with a single twist, it is equivalent to the following figure ... it is not easy... namely, that this, if we depict the inside here, this is commonly realised by what is called a torus. If we make a loop here, what comes here comes in the form of something which comes beyond what I called the axis of the torus, this is what comes in the axis of the torus and this is what encircles the torus. I would ask you on this occasion to verify it, and you will see that the twist, the complete twist that is at stake is exactly equivalent to what Jean-Claude Terrasson calls a complete twist.

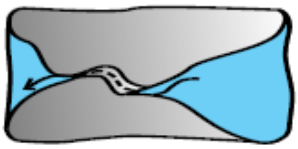

Fig. XI - 8

This is what is realised in the torus of which we obviously only have....The complete twist is everything that one can do on the torus..., which is of course not surprising, because there is no way of operating otherwise on a torus. If on a torus ... you draw something which cuts of course, which cuts by passing what is called ...behind the torus, which reappears in front and which passes behind the torus, what you obtain, is something which is like that and which is completed in the following way..., namely, that it reduplicates the knot which encircles the torus. In other words what comes here is very precisely..., what passes around what I am calling the axis. Therefore this is equivalent to two twists. Here one twist and there two twists.

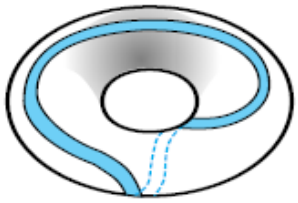

Fig. XI-9

I am now going to ask Jean-Claude Terrasson to take the floor to give a commentary on these figures, these figures which he has made there.

This is a Moebius strip:

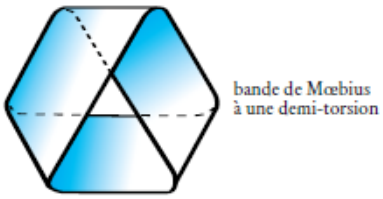

Fig. XI-10

J C Terrasson: So then one can pose the problem of how one can pave space, or pave the plane regularly with flattened Moebius strips, namely, ones that are flattened out. So then the problem is how can I regularly pave the plane by flattening out the Moebius strips,...anyway these strips, namely, one can begin with the zero twist strip which is...if one draws just the edges, one draws them like that, they are only linked by the fact that the strip has a certain materiality to link these two edges. Good then, in order to flatten this figure, in order to flatten it and obtain something which regularly paves the plane, namely, a regular polygon – there are not a whole lot of them, there is only the hexagon, the square and the equilateral triangle – for this I have a very simple solution which is to stick the two edges together in fact to stick one edge, to stick one edge to itself and to flatten it, namely, if I hatch where the surface comes twice one on the other, good that's it. Therefore I obtain a square, good that is not a square, but it could be, on condition that my strip has twice the length as its width and I obtain a square.

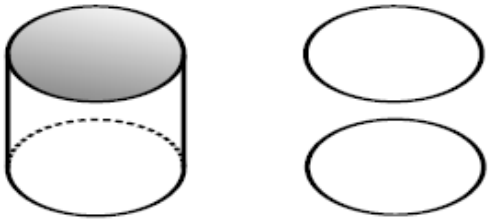

Fig. XI-11

Starting from a half-twist, here the problem is going to be more complicated; but what one can already notice, is that each time, one will obtain, in fact as many as five, one will obtain a regular polygon without a hole namely, what is the hole of the strip finds a means of being reabsorbed to obtain a regular polygon and this will even be the only one that I can get. Good, so then, this figure if I draw its edge, it's that, namely, one sees that this only stays knotted...like the first figure, the edge only holds in its position of twisting with respect to the fact that the strip is also a materiality.

Fig. XI-12

This would no longer be true starting from these strips here where the edges only hold up by themselves outside any materiality of the strip. So then that, is the flattening out of the torus [sic] with a half-twist. Here then I am drawing the edge of the strip and in dots obviously, where it passes underneath and in the front hatching where the surface is covered. Good then this strip like these which are hexagons, to obtain a regular hexagon, the proportions of this must be: width, I take 1 as width, the length will be the root of three: 1 = 1;xxxx L = √3. Good that's not good to get into it.

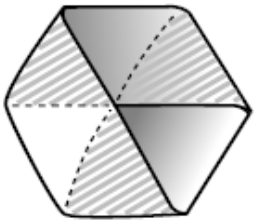

Fig. XI-13

So then what happens to the strip with two half-twists, namely, with one twist, namely, one strip with two edges, here's the way in which the edges of the hole, the edges of the strip are knotted to one another, namely, that here they no longer need the materiality of the strip to maintain their knotting, this indeed is why one goes on to the torus, as Lacan said earlier. So then this figure here is flattened out in the square. But to render these figures more readable...here again the edge is stuck to itself, namely, here it is twice, so I would have to draw it with a little separation to make things visible. By drawing, by hatching there where it covers itself, here with a little separation to see how the hole, the edges of the hole are knotted to one another. There is this figure which is therefore covered, where the surface is covered in its totality, this figure is a square and from that moment on, it is no longer this square here, but it is a square which is obtained with a strip whose length is at the same time its width, L=4l.

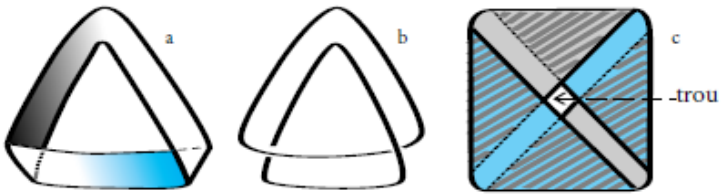

Fig. XI-14

So then when one goes to three half-twists, namely, that here the drawing on the board of the strip is that. I can again flatten out this figure, this strip, here anyway it's similar, I am drawing the visible strip of the hole, and I obtain this figure; namely, that I make it with the strip which has the same, still has the same proportions as that one.

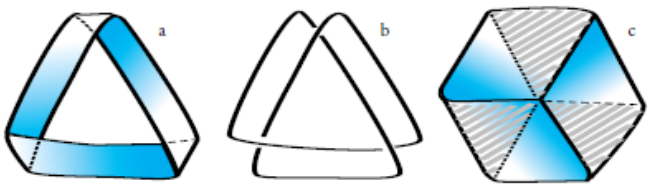

Fig. XI-15

The fourfold strip, it is the strip with four half-twists namely, with two twists, good its edges are knotted in the following fashion, namely, like that, this is the second knot...and one can also say that it is a torus with two holes and this one here, again I can flatten it out. It is similar, I would have to draw the edge of the hole. Here is how it is going to be knotted, and you see that it is the same figure as that one. And this figure here is identical to itself if one reverses it. Here I did not draw the torus with five half-twists, but it is evident that the torus with five half-twists is not going to constitute a regular polygon paving space; there would no longer be a means for that. But if one were to go back to the six-fold one, one could again remake a regular figure paving space.

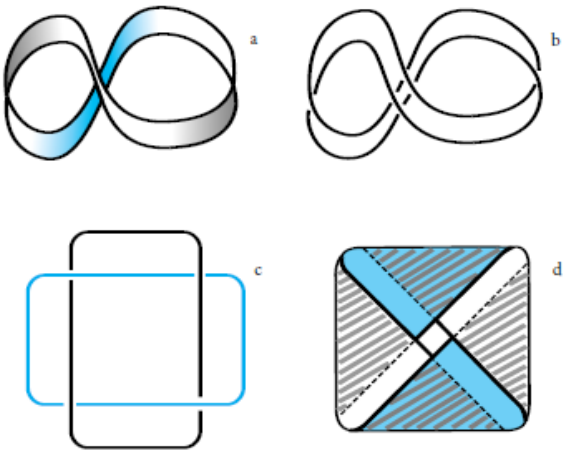

Fig. XI-16

J. Lagarrigue: With a half-twist and with three half-twists, you still have a virtual point, a virtual hole which is a point here and which is just like a little triangle, but it is not obligatory for a single twist and you can reduce it through the dimension of a triangle...

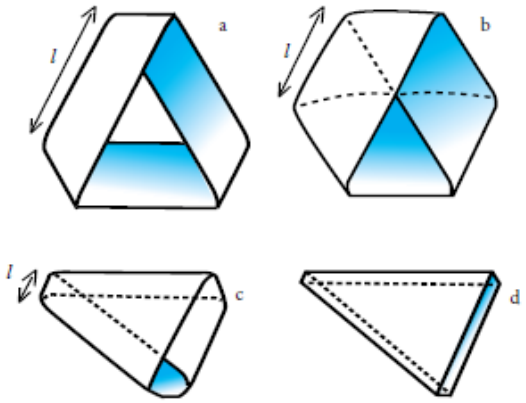

Fig. XI-17

you have this representation here now and you have the edge which describes this schema here, like that, with an edge which is here, which goes behind and you have the edge which goes in front, and which constitutes this schema. But anyway one can reduce these edges to being nothing. So then if you reduce these three edges to being nothing, you obtain a shape which is triangular and which I do not make at all triangular in order for it to be more easily representable and where you have this edge in fact which is going...it is not easy to represent and where you have in fact this edge here, it will come here like that, then it's going to go behind, here like that and then it's going to come in front again, this edge here, there, it is going to go there this little side which is going to be reduced to nothing, it is here, this goes behind and rejoins this edge here, this one therefore is going to be found above and then this one is going to return here to go behind again and it is going to rejoin...here...the third. And then here there is a Moebius strip reduced to its simplest expression and which is no longer reducible and which has the form of a triangle with three successive sections with the first which is represented by this strip which goes like that, then the second – here it's going to go behind and then the second which comes again and which is folded back a third time in order to pass again behind. And in fact this paving which you are making here with the hexagon you can make with the triangle, but it is another much simpler way of doing the paving. And you have here the disappearance that you thought was almost obligatory of this virtual hole which disappears with this representation here. There you are that's what I wanted to say. It's another interpretation.

Terrasson: Why did I make this representation here and not that one? It is because here I have at most a second thickness and a simple thickness and that that, I can obviously represent it, come here moreover by these pavings with which I can pave the plane. And so that allows me...

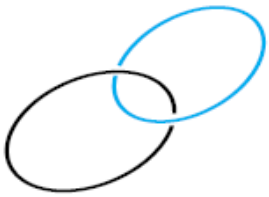
J. Lagarrigue: Here you do not have a virtual hole which cuts the plane, given that the only hole is a hole which is vertical like that, like a sleeve and here at this representation like this you still have a hole which is virtual, which is here a point through which you can pass a needle, a pin, and which disappears in this representation that you have of the three which absolutely overlap and which is in fact the most reduced form possible of a Moebius strip with the single half-twist and which is a representation which is much more reduced than that one because you have eliminated this hexagon effect, which is in effect artificial as one might say, which is no reason to be particular. It's only raison d'être in the form of the Moebius strip has a single half-twist; it is in fact the triangular form and it is here. And this form there, you cannot obtain with the second Moebius strip which is the Moebius strip with three twists where there the existence of this virtual central hole is absolutely obligatory. This can be made very well moreover with a strip of paper.

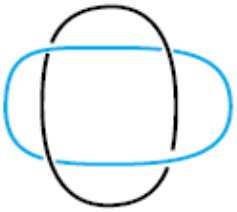
Lacan: What is interesting in this reflection is that, just as for the Moebius strip that I drew the last time, the thinning out of what is at stake, allows a form to be maintained which ends up with a threefold knot and this, I mean the Moebius strip, as is well known the Moebius strip divided on two makes an eight; if I remember properly this eight cut in two gives a shape like the following, namely, something interlaces, if I remember correctly. I believe that I do not remember correctly.

Fig. XI-18



J. Lagarrigue: I believe that that gives a formation which has characteristics like that. When one divides a Moebius strip twice one obtains a strip which is like that, which is of this kind, with a strip like that and which is knotted by a sort of weaving and which is not a simple...there is something which appears to me not to be clear it is your double twist, how do you obtain that figure there?

Fig. XI-19



Terrasson: By flattening out the Moebius strip, a Moebius strip with one twist by flattening it out namely, by making a half-twist each time it takes this form there (inaudible discussion)

Lacan: How is it two edges here interlace? Because in fact it is a fact that they are interlaced, they make an interlacing.

Terrasson: It is the first strip whose edges are obtained by themselves outside the fate of the strip....

Lacan: The two edges are interlaced?

Terrasson: It is the first interlacing of the edges. One can continue. There is a whole series of interlacings.

Lacan: Huh?

Terrasson: There is a whole series of interlacings of the edges.

Lacan: I apologise to you. There is a way of making a Borromean knot with a threefold knot. Nevertheless the question is whether there is another way of making a Borromean knot with the threefold knot. If one groups the three, it is quite obvious that what one obtains will be the same thing, as what one obtains with a Moebius strip. Is there a way, by separating out this threefold knot – this is what I was thinking about this morning – by separating out this threefold knot is there a way by displacing this threefold knot of ensuring that one can go under the second threefold knot which is slightly displaced, that one can pass underneath it, since it is by definition the Borromean knot, that one can go underneath this one which is here below and over this one which is above. This is what I am proposing that you should put to the test, because I wasn't able to put to the test myself this morning. It must on the other hand be clearly said that this threefold knot itself is divided in two, I mean that it is liable to be cut, cut in the middle and that this gives a certain effect that I would also propose you to put to the test.

This promises us for the session of 9 May some results to which I myself will try to give a solution.

Seminar 12: Tuesday 9 May 1978

Things can legitimately be said to know how to behave. It is we who discover how they work. The turning point is that we have to imagine them. It is not always easy because some oratorical, that is to say spoken, precautions are needed.

Thus it is the cut which realises the threefold knot on a torus. To complete this cut, it is necessary, as I might say, to spread it out, namely, redouble it in such a way as to make a strip. This is what you see here on the right – the cut is there on the left – this is what you see here on the right of this drawing which it has to be said is not without a certain awkwardness.

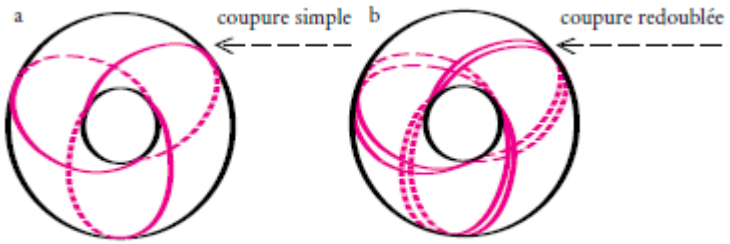

Fig. XII - 1

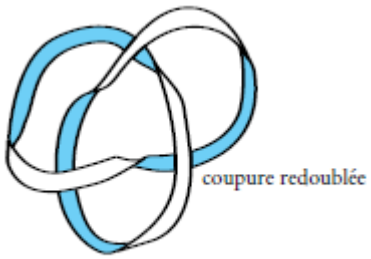

Fig. XII- 2

It has to be redoubled, thanks to which the figure of this strip appears, which for its part gives support, namely, the stuff of the threefold knot.

That is certainly why I stated this absurdity that it was impossible to establish a knot on a torus, which Lagarrigue legitimately took up, for the cut is not enough to make the knot: the strip must be there and you know how it is produced: by redoubling the cut a little to the right, a little to the left, in short by redoubling it. For a cut is not enough to make a knot, there must also be stuff, the stuff of a tube on this occasion which is sufficient. But it must not be believed that the cut suffices to make from the tube a Möbius strip even for example with a triple half-twist. It is the figure that I indicated there, this one which redoubles the cut, this is the figure that I indicated here which provides the stuff for this threefold knot. I am pointing out to you that this threefold knot, is something that is only produced by a cut down the middle of what I called the triple Möbius strip: it is by cutting down the middle this triple Möbius strip that the threefold knot appears, so that after all this is what excuses me for having stated this fact, this absurd fact.

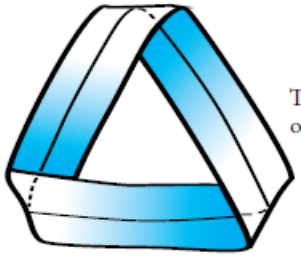

Fig. XII- 3

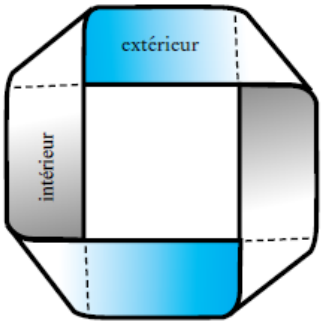
The triple Möbius strip is not capable of lying on a torus; hence it results that, if one cuts out this as it was originally, namely, the cut, the simple cut, this does not make a threefold knot and if one cuts the tube in the way that is represented here (redoubled cut), well then, what one obtains is something which is quite different from what one was expecting, namely, that it is a thing folded over four times: on this occasion, for example, this is the inside of the tube, this is the inside also and this is the outside.

Fig. XII-4



This indeed is why it is not possible to obtain this directly, namely, it is not possible to obtain directly what results for the strip inside the cut, , because this is something that only results by the section along the middle of the triple Möbius strip. This is perhaps what excuses me for having formulated this absurdity that I admitted earlier.

Nevertheless it is a fact that the cut in question realises on the torus something equivalent to the knot and which Lagarrigue was right to reproach me about.

What I said about the things that can be legitimately described as to know how one should behave, is something which supposes the use of what I called the Imaginary. What I said earlier, that one must imagine this stuff, suggests to us that there is something primary in the fact that there are fabrics (tissus). Fabric is particularly linked to imagination, to the point that I would put forward that the support of a fabric, is properly speaking what I called just now the Imaginary. And what is striking, is precisely that, namely, that fabric is only imagined. Therefore we find here something which means that what passes for being the least imagined depends all the same on the Imaginary. It must be said that fabric is not easy to imagine, because it is encountered only in the cut.

If I spoke about the Symbolic the Imaginary and the Real, it is indeed because the Real is the fabric. So then how imagine this fabric? Well then, here precisely is the gap between the Imaginary and the Real, and what is between them, is the inhibition...precisely to imagine. But what is this inhibition, since moreover, we have here an example of it, there is nothing more difficult than to imagine the Real and here it seems that we are going around in circles and that in this affair of fabric, the Real, it is indeed what escapes us and it is indeed the reason why we have the inhibition. It is the gap between the Imaginary and the Real, if indeed it is the case that we can still support it, it is the gap between the Imaginary and the Real which constitutes our inhibition.

The Imaginary the Real and the Symbolic, is what I advanced as three functions which are situated in what is called a plait. It is clear that if one starts from here, this is a plait and what is curious, is that this plait is very particular.

Fig. XII-5

There is something that I would like to produce before you today. This is what it is: it is something that is presented like a strip. 2 covers 1; here it is 1 covers 3; here it is 2 which passes under 3, here it is 1, here it is 3, here it is 2, here it is 3.

And, in a word, at the end, we will find ourselves after 6 exchanges 1-2-3. Well then, this, namely, the equivalent of what is called the Slade strip, with what I depicted here as 1, 2, 3; this equivalence is shown in the fact that it is possible to reduce to this Slade band, by an appropriate manipulation of that in which consists the level where I wrote 1-2-3 [XII-7], it is possible to reduce this to this by inappropriate manipulation.

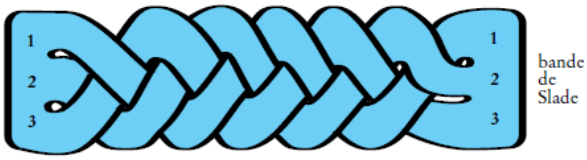

Fig. XII-6

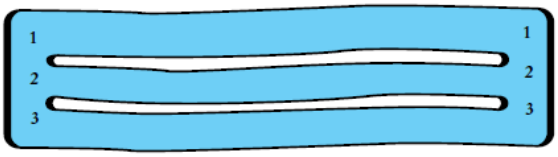

Fig. XII-7

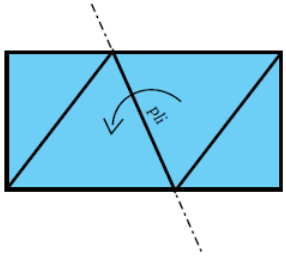
In other words: a plaited belt which terminates by something which is the equivalent of this 1-2-3, namely, on this occasion a waist belt and I mean what is detached in this way (Laughter: Lacan takes off his belt), it is, not simply possible, but easy to demonstrate that this belt if it goes inside this plait, that this belt...It is more than possible in a plaited belt to obtain, with the help of the end of the strap and of the waist belt, to obtain the unknotting of the plait, I am talking about the Borromean plait. Therefore the equivalent of the Borromean plait, is exactly what is posed as unplaitted and this in order to signal for you this equivalence that I assure you you can effectively confirm in the most precise way.

It is no doubt difficult to imagine this fact, but it is a fact.

I would like to suggest to you something that has all its importance, which is the following: it is how can one make the shortest Möbius strip? By folding this triangle here onto that one. There results the following, namely, that something folds back which is this piece here. Well then, it is a matter of seeing that a Möbius strip will be produced by the fact of the folding of this here and of that there. It's an ordinary Möbius strip. Find the equivalent for what is involved in the triple Möbius strip. This Möbius strip is more or less like this:

Fig. XII- 8



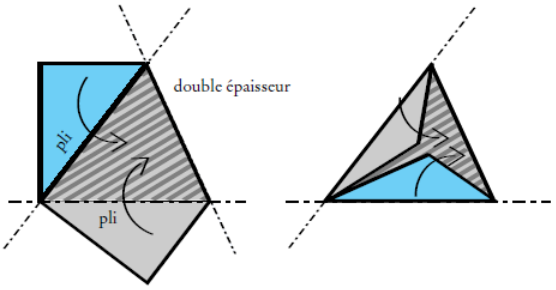


Fig. XII- 9

A curious thing, attack this business of the shortest Möbius strip and you will see that there is another solution, I mean that there is a way to make it still shorter, by still starting from the same equilateral triangle.

What is the relationship between that and psychoanalysis? I would highlight several things, namely, that the things that are at stake have the closest relationship with psychoanalysis. The relationship of the Imaginary of the Symbolic and of the Real, is something which belongs by essence to psychoanalysis. I did not adventure into them for nothing, if only because of the fact that the primacy of the fabric, namely, of what I call on this occasion things, the primacy of fabric is essentially what is necessitated by the highlighting of what is involved in the stuff of a psychoanalysis. If we do not go straight to this distance between the Imaginary and the Real, we are without recourse for what is involved in distinguishing in a psychoanalysis the gap between the Imaginary and the Real. It is not for nothing that I took this path. The thing is what we must stick to and the thing qua imagined, namely, the fabric qua represented. The difference between the representation and the object is something capital. It is at the point that the object at stake is something which can have several representations.

I am going to leave you there for today and perhaps do my seminar again next year at an appropriate date.